The High Election Council statement says that voting results from 219,000 citizens who voted in 730 ballot boxes have not yet reached the council, but that even if all of these were negative it would not greatly change the proportion of approval. The statement recalls the law which stipulates that one more than half of the valid votes are needed for approval and adds: According to these final results, the Turkish Republican Constitution has been approved by the Turkish nation.

Meanwhile, the presidential secretariat general has issued a statement saying that the fact that Gen Kenan Evren who had appointed Bulent Ulusu prime minister has become president does not necessitate or force Ulusu's resignation. The Constitution was published in the second edition of today's Official Gazette and went into effect.

NO ROMANIAN PROPOSAL RECEIVED ON NUCLEAR ZONE

TA100650 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Nov 82

[Text] It has been announced that Turkey has not received a proposal from Romania regarding the establishment of a nuclear weapon-free zone in the Balkans. The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Ambassador Nazmi Akiman, was replying to a question on certain press reports to that effect when he said that during his visit to Romania, President Kenan Evren did not receive such a proposal. Ambassador Akiman stressed that there had not been either a positive or negative reply concerning that question. He went on to say that during President Evren's visit to Romania the two sides had discussed cooperation in the Balkans and holding a meeting for that purpose. Ambassador Akiman added: Even that meeting, which was discussed within that framework, was not planned as a summit in the first stage. Our reply was that the necessary study would be made and our attitude determined only after the assessments regarding the issue were clarified.

Replying to another question during his weekly news conference, Ambassador Akiman said that Turkey had no obligations outside NATO. He said that Turkey favored the holding of deliberations within the alliance if dangerous developments took place outside NATO, adding that contacts were being made for further developing mutlifaceted bilateral cooperation with the regional countries. However, Akiman stressed, these contacts have nothing to do with a multilateral defense arrangement. Those contacts being made within the existing defense and economic cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States are exclusively aimed at NATO defense purposes.

ILTER TURKMEN DISCUSSES REFERENDUM RESULTS

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Turkey wants to maintain its dialogue with those circles that have a sense of responsibility within the Council of Europe. Turkmen who is in Strasbourg, France, for the Ministerial Committee meetings of the Council of Europe that begin tomorrow, was replying to journalists questions today on the referendum held in Turkey last Sunday. The foreign minister described the results of the referendum as "perfect," adding: The parliamentarians from the Council of Europe who came to Turkey to observe the referendum will be able to explain how the referendum was held in great freedom and order and how high the rate of participation was.

On activities against Turkey, Turkmen said: Because of their ideological views, these circles try to break the ties between Turkey and Europe. They do this deliberately and with a certain aim. We want to maintain our dialogue with those circles and associates within the Council of Europe that have a sense of responsibility. On Turkey's relations with the Council of Europe, Turkmen said: We do not attach a greater importance than the Council of Europe on these relations.

Meanwhile, the Council of Europe parliamentarians who observed the referendum in Turkey discussed their positive impressions and views during a joint meeting of the foreign ministers and parliamentarians. The observers explained that, as in Western democracies, the referendum was held under the principls of freedom and secrecy. They also stressed that with this democratic referendum, Turkey made another important step on its return to democracy.

COMMENTS ON PAPANDREOU'S REMARKS ON LIMNOS

[Text] Ankara, 9 Nov (AA) -- The recent statement by Greek Premier Andreas Papandreou alleging that his government has the right to militarize the island of Limnos has no legal basis, Foreign Ministry spokesman Nazmi Akiman said. The Greek prime minister's statement was an entirely arbitrary interpretation without any legal basis of the legal status of the island, which has been established through (international) agreements, Akiman added.

HIJACKERS' EXTRADITION NOT BEING CONSIDERED

Ankara, 9 Nov (AA) -- Foreign Minsitry spokesman Nazmi Akiman Tuesday denied press reports that the three men who hijacked a Soviet airliner to the Black Sea port of Sinop Sunday would be extradited to the Soviet Union. Akiman pointed out the hijackers had committed a criminal offence in Turkey and would therefore be tried in a Turkish court. Extradition or granting of asylum could only be considered after their trial is over, he added.

TCP'S BILEN GREETS CPSU ON 65TH ANNIVERSARY

[Congratulatory message from Turkish Communist Party Secretary General Bilen to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution, dated 7 November -- read by announcer]

[Text] Dear comrades, on behalf of the Central Committee of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP], Turkish communists and our country's working class, I would like to greet you warmly on the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the eminent Great October Socialist Revolution. The Red October opened a new stage in the history of humanity by providing a passage from the capitalist system to socialism. During the Red October, as a result of (?suffering) and under the leadership of Lenin's party, a mighty new state, the lofty Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, was established based on the invincible friendship and brotherhood of all the peoples and nations in the world. This state is progressing with gigantic steps. As it develops, it advances toward a higher stage of communism.

The USSR is the main force behind the preservation of global peace, the most crucial issue facing humanity in the international field. It represents the main factor for the solution of the problem. The existence and the development of the USSR, its unyielding Leninist peaceful policies against the expansionist and imperialist circles, and particularly against the U.S. warmongering and its efforts to drag the world toward the hell of a nuclear war, are an invincible and great source of strength and inspiration for the liberation of all peoples -- including our people as well. The peace program announced by the 26th CPSU Congress and the efforts being exerted for its implementation constitute concrete support for the development or workers' organizations and national liberation movements, and for their activities in favor of world peace.

Pressures on Turkey by the expansionist and aggressive U.S. administration as well as by the ruling NATO circles are being intensified. The currently ruling military administration in Turkey is gradually yielding to these pressures. This situation, these developments are dangerous not only for our country but for all the countries in the region, peace in our area and the existence of the national liberation movements. The TCP, our party, attaches great importance to this dangerous factor. The TCP supports all constructive and concrete Soviet proposals and particularly its responsible and historic resolution not to be the first to use nuclear arms, as well as all its peaceful proposals concerning our area. Our party believes that these proposals preserve our national security and provide (?ample) possibilities for peaceful and progressive forces.

The TCP considers the development of relations with our great neighbor the Soviet Union -- which has supplied the greatest support to our country since the days of our national independence war -- as a great contribution to world and regional peace.

Dear comrades, the TCP is tightly bound with the brotherly CPSU within the framework of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and the international proletariat.

On the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the lofty October, we deeply greet all the Soviet communists as well as all the Soviet peoples who live by communist principles and who devotedly defend world peace. Long live the Great October Revolution! Long live the CPSU! Long live Marxism-Leninism! Long live the international proletariat!

CHANCELLOR KREISKY COMMENTS ON BREZHNEV'S DEATH

["Improvised statement to the press in the Parliament building" on Brezhnev's death by Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, in Vienna on 11 Nov -- recorded]

[Text] Concerning Brezhnev, Soviet and world politics are losing a man who -- to mention positive things first -- was linked to the political idea of detente. He was the one, so to speak, who turned Helsinki into reality, and for some time the situation was such that one thought that a far-reaching detente would be achieved between the United States and the Soviet Union. The most noteworthy thing in this respect was the famous embrace after the SALT negotiations in Vienna between President Carter and Brezhnev. Thus, he somehow played a role in the stage of detente, a role that should not be historically belittled.

However, on the other hand, his name is not only linked with the policy of detente but also with the so-called Brezhnev doctrine, and this Brezhnev doctrine actually means that the Soviet Union claims the right to intervene directly or indirectly whenever there is a political crisis -- or what it views as a political crisis -- in one of its ally states.

This happened in a staggering manner [erschuetternderweise] in the case of the CSSR and apparently, in an indirect manner, in Poland also.

Question: Mr Federal Chancellor, do you believe that the Soviet leadership's readiness for talks with the West will decrease somewhat now after the death of Brezhnev, who always sought talks and at least abided by them?

Answer: I am deeply convinced that the policy of Brezhnev -- or for which Brezhnev is considered responsible -- was the policy of the entire group of leadership of his Politburo, and that nothing will change in this policy. However, should the coming period lead to Diadochi struggles [reference to ancient Macedonian generals' power struggle] -- which I rather doubt -- then there may be changes in foreign policy, too. However, I believe that for a long time the Soviet leadership has counted on Brezhnev's loss and has prepared for it.

KREISKY: I DID NOT SOLICIT U.S. INVITATION

[Report on debate in Austrian Parliament on 9 November 1982 -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Initial portion omitted, including statement by Freedom Party Deputy Holger Bauer in which he criticized Chancellor Kreisky's satisfaction over his invitation to visit President Reagan, whom, he says, the Austrian Socialists used to "decry as Old Nick personified"]

[Begin Kreisky recording] I would like to inform the high house that I have never solicited an invitation to any country and hence also not to the United States, and that I have not asked anybody to present any requests in this respect, but that this invitation to visit the United States was exclusively extended on the initiative of the U.S. Administration. [end Kreisky recording]

NETHERLANDS

PRESS REACTION TO U.S. MIDTERM ELECTIONS

PM101003 [Editorial Report] Netherlands newspapers from 4 November publish editorials on the U.S. midterm election results. They express the view that the results are a setback for President Reagan, who will have to give more thought to possible policy changes even though the gains of the Democrats do not amount to a total vote of no confidence on the present administration. Rotterdam's NRC HANDELSBLAD writes on page 7: "The result is a shot across the bow expressing the voters' desire for a number of changes of course. It confirms the impression of U.S. reporters during the election campaign that even Republican voters from the world of commerce and industry want a "more evenhanded" policy. This means that the President should spend less on defense, that more should be done to prevent tax evasion and that opportunities to increase taxes should be sought. A contributory factor in the desire for a more even-handed policy is that the high level of unemployment, around 10 percent, is already leading to long lines of hopeless people receiving free meals from churches and charitable institutions."

The election results also confirm that the Republican hopes of a lasting majority over the Democrats have been dashed. Amsterdam's DE VOLKSKRANT writes on page 3: "At any rate, the result of the congressional election lends no support to the notion put forward by the Republicans 2 years ago that the coalition of voter groups, which have given the Democrats a structural majority since the days of Franklin Roosevelt, has now definitely collapsed in favor of a new Republican (conservative) majority, which will persist through numerous elections. Election research shows that various traditional Democrat voter groups such as the elderly Blacks, and the Jewish electorate have returned to the fold of their "mother party." Only the regional dividing line, with the South and Southwest as the new Republican bastion, has reappeared."

DE VOLKSKRANT closes with a comment on the nuclear arms referenda held concurrently with the election: "Added to the reasonable success of the referenda on a nuclear arms freeze, Tuesday's outcome does amount to some support for those Democrats and Republicans who are attempting to redirect the White House course, which is based on rigid ideological notions, in a less extreme, more pragmatic direction. The further pursuit of such a goal also offers a better chance for Reagan's future Democratic challenger or his successor, and that can only be beneficial."

KOHL GIVES STATEMENT ON BREZHNEV DEATH

[Statement by Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl in Bonn on 11 November; from the "Tagesthemen" program -- recorded]

[Text] On the occasion of the death of the CPSU general secretary and chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet, I have conveyed to the Soviet Government our condolences on behalf of the Federal Government and on behalf of our citizens.

During his term in office, Leonid Brezhnev contributed very greatly to the intensification of German-Soviet relations; his German interlocuters will remember the significance he attached to a favorable development of relations between our countries.

The Soviet Union is one of the powers responsible for Berlin and for Germany as a whole. In the future also too, the Federal Government will continue its policy of good-neighborliness, if possible, toward the Soviet Union on the basis of the treaties concluded, the agreements made and the related declarations.

The important Helsinki Final Act also bears the signature of General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev. On this day, however, many people will recall the tragic events in Poland, Prague and Afghanistan.

In the future also, the Federal Government will devote very special attention to the relationship with the Soviet Union -- just as I stressed in my government statement on 13 October -- because the Soviet Union as our neighbor, as our powerful and great neighbor, bears special responsibility for world peace.

Kohl Condolences to Tikhonov

[Text] Bonn, 11 Nov (DPA) -- The text of the condolence telegram from Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl to Nikolay A. Tikhonov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, published by the Federal Press Office today, is as follows: "On the occasion of the death of Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium and general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, I express to you and to the peoples of the Soviet Union my sincere sympathy.

During the period of office of the deceased, treaties and agreements were concluded which created the basis for a better relationship between our countries in the future. General Secretary Brezhnev made a substantial contribution to this development.

In my meetings with Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, I came to know him as a personality who attached great importance to a long-term positive development of German-Soviet relations.

It is my sincere desire that relations between our two countries be consistently continued on the basis of concluded treaties and agreements, for the mutual benefit of our peoples and in the interest of peace in Europe and the world.

[Signed]"Helmut Kohl, federal chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany".

Bundestag Tribute

[Text] Bonn, 11 Nov (DPA) -- The deputies of the Bundestag stood in tribute today to the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev. The deputy president of the Bundestag, Georg Leber (SPD), said that Brezhnev was one of the figures "whose rank and influence in international politics is of historic importance." In particular, Leber recalled Brezhnev's three visits to the Federal Republic in 1973, 1978 and 1981 "and the strong impression that his personality left in our country." On behalf of the Bundestag, Leber expressed his genuine sympathy to the leadership and peoples of the Soviet Union on the grave loss they have suffered with Brezhnev's death.

GENSCHER INTERVIEW ON CSCE, DOMESTIC ISSUES

DW101439 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germand 0620 GMT 9 Nov 82

[Interview with Foreign Minister Hnas-Dietrich Genscher by reporter Hauschild; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Citing reliable CSU sources, today's morning papers say that Bavarian Minister-President Franz-Josef Strauss has now definitely decided to run as Bundestag candidate and that he will lay claim to the position of foreign minister in the event of a CDU/CSU election victory. In that case, if the FDP remained in the Bundestag, Hans-Dietrich Genscher could assume the Ministry of the Interior which the FDP has recently said it should have. Is this the conclusion the CSU has drawn from the Berlin FDP congress?

[Answer] You'll have to ask the CDU about that.

[Question] Is that all you have to say to this?

[Answer] Yes, I don't want to take part in a public discussion of positions. We have made a decision about the composition of the Federal Government until 6 March. In doing this all sides felt that it is good for a country such as the FRG, which is located on the line between the East and the West, to have its foreign political continuity and predictability maintained by people such as the foreign minister, who was responsible for foreign policy in the former government. This was a businesslike justification and consideration; I think we should leave it at that.

[Answer] There must be prospects because the CSCE process, which was initiated with the adoptation of the Helsinki Final Act in 1975, is a political development which the FRG has promoted in the interests of the European people, and many improvements can be achieved through this Final Act. It is also important for cooperation between the East and the West, and in connection with your question about the Madrid follow-up conference, there is the significant problem of the establishment of a European disarmament conference.

Such a conference should adopt confidence-building measures between the East and the West in all of Europe, that is, from the Atlantic to the Urals. This means that we should get a better look at military plans and military movements, which would offer protection against surprise attacks. This is of greatest importance for us in Western Europe in view of the great conventional weapons superiority of the Soviet Union. Confidence-building measures are a good means for reducing mistrust, and the reduction of mistrust is the prerequisite for successful arms control and disarmament negotiations.

In other words, these are things which are, after all, not just in the interests of the Soviet Union, but which are just as much in our interests. The entire CSCE process can be successful only if both sides expect to gain something from it.

We have shown, by the way, that the Madrid conference is particularly suited to outlining our views on events in the Warsaw Pact, including events in the Polish People's Republic. It would certainly be a mistake for the West to deprive itself of the opportunity to frankly discuss at such a conference matters which affect us in connection with the developments in Poland.

[Question] The human rights debate in Madrid, with which the delegates will be dealing, is certainly logical, particularly because of the agreements contained in the Helsinki third basket.

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] Because of the sensitivity of the East on this issue, the actual aim of the negotiations, which we just discussed, could eventually fade away.

[Answer] From its beginning, we have considered the CSCE process to be a long-term affair. Therefore, it was agreed to Helsinki that stocktaking conferences, the so-called follow-up conferences, should take place every second year. The first one was held in Belgrade, and it ended without substantial results. Now there is the Madrid conference where results have been achieved on a number of issues, but unfortunately not on all of them. This must be said very clearly.

We believe that it is in the interests of cooperation in Europe, in the interests of stability, in the interests of East-West relations and thus also in the interests of the people that we seriosly try to make the Madrid conference a sucess, despite all the difficulties. Whether this will be possible is not just up to the West; the East must also cooperate. This is the case in all similar developments. We should really try to do everything to achieve the success we desire.

[Question] On the one hand, there are honest efforts and strivings, while, on the other, there is the critical question whether anything can be done at all regarding the martial law problem in Poland. Can you really be optimistic?

[Answer] It is not a question of our optimism or pessimism, but a problem regarding what we can to do create the framework conditions to avert aggravation and then subsequently permit improvements. The other side must never be relieved of its responsibility -- neither the Soviet Union nor the Polish leadership. I must repeat, however, that breaking off the conference would certainly not change the situation in Poland. Viewed that way, we must take advantage of the CSCE process to work toward improvements by using the means available to us.

I am of the opinion that particularly in connection with the difficult East-West developments, which undoubtedly exist, it is correct to continue the Vienna negotations on the reduction of forces in central Europe. We are doing this. It is equally important for us to negotiate on the banning of chemical weapons. I might add that it is equally important to talk in Madrid about the situation in the East and the West, and about possibilities for cooperation and improvements for the people.

All this is an expression of Western efforts to contribute to stability. Nobody would understand if we said that we will continue some of these negotiations, such as in Geneva and Vienna, but suspend the Madrid talks. This is why the Federal Government states that we must make efforts.

[Question] Earlier, some 2 years ago, as well as in February, you went personally to Madrid to add political weight to the negotiations....

[Answer -- interrupting] Yes.

[Question] ...to raise them from the level of simple negotiators to the of foreign ministers. Why don't you do this again? Does this indicate a changed strategy by the Federal Government after the change in Bonn?

[Answer] No, on the contrary. The Federal Government -- and this is a part of the continuity I mentioned earlier in another context -- wants to place great weight on these negotiations. You might remember that at the time, a number of Western foreign ministers went to Madrid following my suggestion and request, but the Eastern states were not represented on a ministerial level -- nor were all Western states either, by the way.

If no negotiations on the ministerial level take place at the opening of the conference, this doesn't mean the situation has changed. For the moment we must see how the conference will be conducted by all involved. The effect of the attendance of ministers mustn't be diminished by opening every new conference phase with their presence.

WOERNER INTERVIEW ON MISSILE DEPLOYMENT ISSUE

DW101223 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1730 GMT 9 Nov 82

[Text] [Question] How optimistic are you that something positive will be achieved for us at the Geneva negotiations?

[Answer] I am -- how should I put it -- relatively optimistic. I believe that the Soviets will make a move once they have realized that if they don't, they will have to reckon with the deployment of American weapons systems.

[Question] They must reckon with that?

[Answer] They must reckon with it if they don't reduce their armament lead represented by their SS-20 potential.

[Question] Will December 1983 necessarily mark the end of negotiations, or can they go on? American journalists were very amazed when they understood you to say that negotiations could continue after then.

[Answer] I don't understand the amazement at all, because the dual decision says nothing about a continuation of negotiations. In my opinion it wouldn't be justified at all for our side to discontinue negotiations if no success were achieved by then. One thing must be clear however: We will begin deploying these weapons systems as planned, so that the Soviet realize that we mean what we say.

[Question] There has been an uneasiness and difficulties with numbers regarding medium-range missiles such as the Pershing II. I would like to ask you once more: Will there be 108 missiles and no more?

[Answer] No more than 108. You can be aboslutely sure about that. I have told the Americans this with the necessary clarity at the particular request of Chancellor Kohl who has said that things will remain as planned. We are loyal to treaties and we know that this is necessary. We are for disarmament, but if it must be and if the Soviets won't yield, we will deploy them -- but not one missile more than agreed.

[Question] May I ask how Weinberger reacted to this?

[Answer] He took note of its affirmatively; this means the Americans know it.

[Question] An election campaign is in the offing in the Federal Republic. We heard today from Germany that Egon Bahr wrote an article in which he said that the SPD was closer to a negative stand on the counterarmement decision. What will happen if this issue becomes an issue in the election campaign?

[Answer] That will be a pleasant situation for us. Helmut Schmidt has rightly repeatedly called himself the father of the dual decision. Mr Bahr must discuss this with segments of his own party and with the former chancellor and not so much with us. For good reason, we will stand by the agreement of the former government. If the SPD wants to appear as not being credible and to give the impression that it is more split than it really is, it should do it as it pleases.

[Question] Dr Werner Marx said a week ago that he is in favor of much more frank discussions among the people and that this would be possible if, for example, the military leaders and the Defense Ministry informed them where the missiles could be deployed.

[Answer] I must say that I actually understand this standpoint and that we must certainly be much more frank with regard to security policy in the fture. In the current situation, however, with the agreements in the alliance and the decisions left behind by the former government, I see no reason and no possibility to alter things. In other words, the places of deployment will not be named.

Defends NATO Decision Position

[Interview with Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner by correspondent Fritz Pleitgen in Washington, in the "Tagesthemen" program, date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, your remark, that negotiations in Geneva might continue even after medium-range weapons have been deployed in Germany has triggered a discussion. Bahr has defined his stance on this and Alois Mertes has made some statements about it. Did you also discuss this with Weinberger, and is this a new position by the West?

[Answer] I did not talk with Weinberger about this, and it is certainly not a new position by the West. In my view, this idea is simply a foregone conclusion. If Mr Bahr is camouflaging his own disengagement from the dual decision by attacking me, this is his own business. All I want to do is ask him whether in that event he would call off the negotiations and refuse further negotiations. I believe that I am proceeding on the basis of the dual decision, and the new Federal Government has left no doubt at all that it will abide by both parts of the dual decision just as it has been adopted.

[Question] The dual decision, however, also mentions a time factor. This factor would lose relevance if it now said that negotiations could continue afterwards. Aren't we facing conditions similar to those at the Vienna negotiations?

[Answer] Not at all, or would you want to disrupt the negotiations? This has nothing to do with it. The time factor remains in effect. If the Soviet Union doesn't come across and refuses to come round to the zero solution, then the deployment will take place without delay, as set forth in the dual decision. This was, and remains our position. I fail to see -- or rather I understand -- why Mr Bahr wants to make this the subject of debate. This is obviously unpleasant for him because he sees the dilemma into which he has been plunged.

[Question] Is this a view adopted by Bonn or has it been coordinated with Washington? Are there any talks going on about this?

[Answer] There has not been any coordination in that respect with Washington. All I can say is that I merely expressed what I consider to be a foregone conclusion.

[Question] In that case, however, Washington would have to be consulted because it is Washington that is conducting the negotiations.

[Answer] Listen, I am man enough to voice my own opinion, aren't I? It is not necessary to ask what I think about my own opinion.

[Question] You are, after all, the defense minister of an important NATO partner whose opinion is certainly of interest in Washington.

[Answer] Listen, I cannot allow Mr Bahr or you to impose on me a position which the alliance does not advocate. All I can say is that I support what is written in the dual decision, as does the Federal Government.

[Question] Nevertheless, it is interesting to know what the Americans have to say about this.

[Answer] You'll have to ask the Americans about that.

[Question] You haven't asked them yet?

[Answer] I did not ask them, and I do not intend to.

Bahr Rejects Woerner Ideas

[From the "Tagesthemen" program presented by Gerhard Fuchs]

[Text] Federal Defense Minister Woerner has gone to the United States with self-confidence and in good spirits. His message is that the new CDP/CSU-FDP coalition stands firmly by the United States and the NATO dual decision. The basic principles of this decision are known -- first, negotiations on arms limitations, and second, if the negotiations fail, the deployment of new medium-range missiles. Woerner has added a third facet to this decision: In the event new weapons are deployed after the failure of the negotiations, negotiations should still continue. This additional aspect has now evoked a reaction from Egon Bahr, SPD disarmament expert. He sees the West's negotiating positions being weakened and German positions destroyed by Woerner. Harald Brandt talked with Egon Bahr:

[Answer] So far, the FRG has urged both the Americans and the Russians to conclude their negotiations before the missile deployment begins. We have brought pressure to bear on Americans and Russians alike in order to achieve this. When Mr Woerner now says that negotiations might continue after the siting deployment, then first, this is a position earlier advocated by the CDU; second, it is a point which no longer represents any thing such as continuity; and third, it is a point where the German position has been violated. We can only fear that the Ameircans will no longer negotiate with extreme efforts, as Helmut Schmidt put it. They no longer need to put maxium efforts into the negotiations. Once the deployment is complete, it will be possible to continue negotiations for 8-9 years, just as is happening in Vienna regarding conventional weapons.

[Question] You and the SPD proceed from the premise that it will be completely impossible to conduct negotiations after deployment.

[Answer] It is my view that Woerner's position means that not even a proposal on a moratorium will make any sense because in 1979 we approved the dual decision, and we said that we have 4 years to negotiate and that 4 years are required for the production of the weapons. We have lost 2 years for the negotiations. We might rather say that it is necessary to make up for lost time in the negotiations rather than to deploy in advance.

[Question] Mr Bahr, you have said that the time is drawing closer when the SPD will come out against deployment. Is this in harmony with the party congress decisions?

[Answer] It would be in line with the party congress decision if one side ceases to negotiate with maximum efforts, and is even encouraged in that respect by the Federal Government. [end video recording]

Government Defends Woerner

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government intervened today with a detailed statement in the internal political argument regarding the implementation of the NATO dual decision, and defended Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU). Government Spokesman Diether Stolze stressed that in his remarks about the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles, Woerner acted within the framework of German interests. There can be no question of Woerner having taken up political positions with his statement that further talks will still be possible even after the date set for counterarming at the end of 1982.

Stolze also expressly mentioned the possibility that not only the desired zero solution but also "partial results" can be achieved in Geneva. A partial result can be only a partial disarmament of Soviet medium-range missiles together with a parallel limited NATO counterarming, provided that the balance of forces is maintained. In this event, negotiations will then continue in order to bring about the desired zero solution.

Criticism by SPD disarmament expert Egon Bahr that Woerner is undermining the West's position and removing the time limit in which the two nuclear world powers are to reach a zero solution is described by Stolze as a "deliberately wrong interpretation." In reality, Bahr is relinquishing German positions.

With regard to the Federal Government's attitude, Stolze explained that it would be illogical "for us to say that from a certain date onward we will no longer be ready to hold any talks at all." Further talks are necessary if only because counterarming will, after all, "last many years."

SPD Attacks Woerner Promises

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Nov (DPA) -- At the end of the budget debate, on Thursday evening, the SPD sharply attacked Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU). SPD Deputy Hans-Joachim Hoffmann reproached the minister for having made nonapproved promises of payment to NATO during his talks in the United States, thus having 'deceived and denigrated' the FRG Parliament. According to repeated newspaper reports, not disclaimed by Woerner, the minister promised an additional DM350 million for the NATO infrastructure program. However, according to FRG budget law, additional funds would have to be approved by the Budget Committee.

Hoffman asked Woerner and the Federal Government to clarify whether the cabinet has passed this promise, which he called a 'unique event' in the postwar history of the German Parliament and whether Woerner has made that promise in the United States.

Federal Finance Minister Gerhard Stoltenberg (CDU) said that the Federal Government conducted international negotiations under full consideration of the German budget law. He assumed that Woerner also adhered to this. However it was also customary for cabinet members to introduce new elements in such talks, something which had to apply in particular to the security area. Furthermore, the decision of the 1984/86 infrastructure program could be taken only by NATO and not bilaterally.

STOLTENBERG SUBMITS DRAFT BUDGET TO BUNDESTAG

[Excerpts] Bonn, 10 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Finance Minister Gerhard Stoltenberg (CDU) today presented the altered 1983 draft budget and its accompanying economy bills and employment measures to the Bundestag. He blamed the SPD/FDP government of former Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt for the high rate of unemployment and high state deficits. In view of these burdens, the new CDU/CSU/FDP coalition has no alternative but for the time being, to place higher burdens on employees, pensioners, and the sick and unemployed. Citizens, organizations, trade unions and politicians must have understanding for the fact that the changes resulting from a new financial policy cannot be measured in months but in years.

The new government expects that there will be no economic growth in 1983 and that the average number of unemployed will be about 2.35 million.

The main element of an immediate program beginning in 1983 will be a revival of housing construction, Stoltenberg said. In 1983 and 1984, DM2.5 billion in investment aid is to be made available to this key area. It is indisputable that investments to create jobs are among the most urgent priorities.

New Federal Budget Explained

[Fides Krause-Brewer report on the new federal budget in the "Heute" newscast]

[Excerpt] Next year the Federal Government plans to spend DM253.84 billion, or 2.9 percent more than this year. Since the revenues of the state do not suffice, the state must incur new debts in the amount of DM41.5 billion.

The biggest chunks in the budget are the Federal Labor Ministry with roughly DM59 billion; defense with DM46 billion; traffic and transport with roughly DM29 billion; and youth, family and health with about DM17 billion.

What is alarming is the budget item involving the federal debt service. From 1982 to 1983 it will increase by 23 percent to about DM31 billion. This reflects the speed with which the interest costs for the state's indebtedness are increasing. Once again, lower tax revenues and extra expenditures, for example on unemployment, prevent this speed from being effectively slackened.

SPD REPORTS STRONG INFLUX OF NEW MEMBERS

DW101709 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 10 Nov 82 p 4

[Text] Duesseldorf, 10 November -- According to Johannes Rau, SPD Land chairman and North Rhine-Westphalia minister-president, more than 10,000 citizens of North Rhine-Westphalia have joined the SPD since the fall of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The decrease in membership which had worried the Duesseldorf party leadership prior to the fall of the chancellor was "more than offset" by the wave of new members Rau said happily. A preliminary review of personal data shows that "a pleasantly high share" of the new Social Democrats belong to the young generation. According to the SPD Land chairman, his organization is about to break through the "sound barrier" of 300,000 members, which had been a target for years.

Rau intends to break through this barrier with an "SPD policy with liberal accents."

ENVOY TO ARGENTINA ON MISSING FRENCH CITIZENS

AB101000 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in English 0920 GMT 10 Nov 82

[Statement to the press of French Ambassador to Argentina Jean-Dominique Paolini on 8 November 1982, place of issuance not given]

[Text] "Over several years the French Government has intervened on various occasions to try to obtain information from the Argentine authorities concerning the fifteen French nationals reported by their families as having been kidnapped and gone missing in Argentina during the events that occurred from 1975 to 1978.

"It has constantly sought to help families who asked for such assistance to obtain news of their missing relatives of whatever nationality.

"The Argentine authorities have not so far communicated precise information to it on the fate of these persons. The French Government is following very closely the development of judicial investigations and proceedings undertaken or likely to be undertaken on the application of humanitarian organizations and families.

"Should the body of one of our unfortunate compatriots be identified, it would, needless to say, be transferred immediately to France where it would be received with the appropriate marks of respect."

MITTERRAND PLANS VISIT TO MOROCCO IN JANUARY

[Roland Delcour dispatch: "Announcement of Mr Mitterrand's Visit to Morocco in January Ends Rumors of Tension Between Paris and Rabat"]

[Excerpt] Rabat -- Those who feared tension between the two countries learned with relief on Monday 8 November of the new date for Mr Mitterrand's official visit to Morocco. That visit will take place on 27 and 28 January 1983. That news coincided with the publication of an explanation by Moroccan ambassador in Paris Youssef ben Abbes, stating that [former French President] Mr Giscard d'Estaing had not received any "official" invitation to visit Morocco. The ambassador stated: "In fact a private visit to Morocco by Mr Giscard d'Estaing had been envisaged since the end of 1981, but the king's many engagements, particularly at the end of the year, meant that no date was fixed for that visit."

MINISTER COT CITED ON COOPERATION WITH TUNISIA

["M.D." dispatch: "France Will Give Help on Sixth Development Plan"]

[Text] Tunis -- France is prepared to assist in the implementation of the sixth Tunisian development plan, taking account of the priorities contained in it. [French] Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot said when he left Tunis on Friday, 5 November at the end of a 36-hour visit.

During the talks which Mr Cot had with Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali and several members of the government, it was decided that after the joint cultural abd technical cooperation commission's annual meeting in Tunis on 15 December, groups of experts will be established to make a detailed assessment of the action to be taken, notably to help agriculture, rural development and scientific research -- sectors which are among the Tunisians' main concerns.

In the sphere of education and vocational training, cooperation will be pursued in the same spirit but an effort will be made to adapt it more effectively to Tunisia's new needs. As regards secondary education, Mr Cot said that France will make a special effort when the Lycee Carnot in Tunis, which will become the Lycee Bourguiba, is handed over to the Tunisian authorities at the start of the 1983 academic year. It will be a bicultural establishment with the goal of preparing Tunisians for the French professional training colleges. "This will be a great Franco-Tunisian venture," the minister said, "and the expression of contact between and interpenetration of our two cultures."

The plan to restore visa requirements for Tunisian nationals visiting France was not discussed during the talks, nor has it so far produced any reaction from the Tunisian authorities. Moreover, it is to be discussed during negotiations which will take place during the joint consular commission meeting scheduled to take place in Paris on 6 December. Questioned by Tunisian journalists, Mr Cot deplored the fact that visitors to Tunis have been turned back "arbitrarily in some cases" and recalled the government's position that the measures envisiged are aimed at "ensuring the safety and stability to which the workers settled in France are entitled."

STATEMENT ON UPPER VOLTA MINISTER'S DEATH

AB110631 Paris AFP in English 0403 GMT 11 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, 11 Nov (AFP) -- The French Foreign Ministry Wednesday said that Upper Voltan Interior Minister Nezien Badembie, who was shot dead Tuesday, had changed his mind after asking the French Government for political asylum and had handed himself over to the new authorities.

In a statement issued to clarify the circumstances surrounding Lt Col Nezien's death following Sunday's coup in Ouagadougou, the Foreign Ministry said that Lt Col Nezien went to the French Embassy on Sunday morning to ask for protection, which was granted.

Local authorities were advised of this Tuesday morning, and were told that France had no intention of handing over Lt Col Nezien. The embassy suggested that he be granted safe conduct out of the country.

Later Tuesday, Lt Col Nezien told the French ambassador that he had decided to join the new Voltan authorities. The ambassador, who reiterated his invitation for the interior minister to remain in the embassy while the situation was clarified, accompanied him to police headquarters.

The Ouagadougou authorities summoned the French ambassador ate Tuesday afternnon and announced that Lt Col Nezien had been ordered imprisoned, and tnat he had been mortally wounded by one of his guards on the way to his cell.

The French Government refused to comment on Lt Col Nezien's death.

Cot on Coup

AB110825 Paris AFP in French 0715 GMT 11 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, 11 Nov (AFP) -- The French minister for cooperation and development, Jean-Pierre Cot, Wednesday evening expressed "concern" over the circumstances in which the former Upper Voltan interior minister was "killed" in Ouagadougou Tuesday night.

Mr Cot, speaking during the "Third World Press Club" program on Radio-France International, refused to comment on the recent coup d'etat in Upper Volta, saying only that it had brought to power a team "of whom we do not know much." The minister said he hopes this new team will "respect human rights," pointing out his concern over the fate of Lieutenant Colonel Nezien, who was killed after willingly leaving the French Embassy, where he had sought refuge earlier.

EXTRADITION RULES, DST, DGSE CHIEFS ANNOUNCED

[Text] Paris, Nov 10 (AFP) -- The government today issued new extradition guidelines aimed at clarifying an issue which has become controversial in this country since the left came to power last year.

Coinciding with the move, new chiefs were named for both the domestic and foreign intelligence services, with Yves-Louis Bonnet, 47, taking over as head of the Territorial Surveillance Department (DST) which covers France, and Rear Admiral Pierre Lacoste, 58, named Director General of External Security (DGSE).

Addressing the cabinet at its weekly meeting today, Justice Minister Robert Badinter said the 1927 French extradition law would not be modified, but that four guidelines would henceforth be used in applying it. Extradition, he said, would not be accepted:

1) If the political system of the country requesting extradition was incompatible with democratic principles or its justice system did not respect human rights and freedoms.

2) If the acts for which extradition was requested were a political nature.

3) If the extradition request had a political aim.

4) If the situation of the person being extradited was likely to worsen.

Mr Badinter said the aim of the move was to alter what he described as having become "a veritable dogma abroad: That France would never extradite anyone." However, the justice minister added, France intends to maintain its commitment to the right to asylum as stated in the Constitution and will retain "the most liberal (extradition) policy in all of Western Europe" while cooperating with other countries. In parallel to the new guidelines, he said, bilateral extradition treaties would be signed. A new treaty has already been concluded with Egypt, and Mr Badinter is to travel to Washington this month to sign a convention with the United States.

Meanwhile, the changes at the top of the French espionage services were presented today as routine. Mr Bonnet, a career civil servant who is currently the prefect of the French overseas territory of Mayotte in the Indian Ocean, will replace Marcel Chalet, 60, who is retiring as head of the domestic intelligence service due to his age. But while outgoing Foreign Security Chief Pierre Marion, 61, was said to have resigned at his own request, rumors have circulated here that he had been unpopular at the DGSE since taking over in June 1981.

According to the French newsweekly L'EXPRESS, Mr Marion concentrated authority in his own hands on the grounds that the espionage unit had retained links with the former conservative government and that "better control" was needed. But other intellignece officers complained that the rapid changes in working methods at the "swimming pool", as the DGSE is known, added to their work without improving the quality of the service, L'EXPRESS said.

Rear Admiral Lacoste, who succeeds Mr Marion, served as military cabinet chief from 1978 to 1980 under former Prime Minister Raymond Barre and has since commanded the French Mediterranean fleet. He is a career naval officer.

GOVERNMENT FALL THREATENED FROM INTERNAL STRIFE

Spadolini Resignation Rumored

[Excerpt] Rome, November 10 -- All indicators point to the resignation of Premier Giovanni Spadolini today when he confers with President Sandro Pertini on the state of affairs within his five-party coalition and the bitter infighting between the Christian Democrat Treasury minister and the Socialist finance minister, according to most editorial comment in the nation's press today.

The premier, upon his return to Rome Monday night at the end of a weeklong visit to the United States, toughly declared that either Beniamino Andreatta of the Treasury and Finance Minister Rino Formica would step down or he would resign the helm of his second cabinet, sworn in on August 23.

Referring to the violent polemics which erupted during his absence and the nasty personal overtones running through the ministers' charges and countercharges, Spadolini said he intended to confer with the party secretaries on the prospects for a cabinet reshuffle.

Pertini Refuses Resignation

[Text] Rome, Nov 11 (AFP) -- Italian President Sandro Pertini today refused the resignation of Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, offered earlier in the day. President Pertini asked Mr Spadolini to go before Parliament "to detail the government's political and institutional situation", a presidential statement said.

Mr Spadolini announced his intention to resign at the end of a cabinet meeting because of a developing feud between the Christian Democratic Treasury Minister Nino Andreatta and the Socialist Finance Minister Rino Formica.

Spadolini Statement

LD111846 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 11 Nov 82

[Luciano Lombardi dispatch from the Quirinal]

[Text] The president of the republic has rejected Giovanni Spadolini's resignation and has sent the prime minister back to the chambers. Here is the statement made by Spadolini at the end of his talks with Pertini which lasted about an hour:

[Begin Spadolini recording] I tendered the government's resignation to the president of the republic to whom I renew my feelings of deep gratitude for his affectionate feelings of trust with which he has followed the course of a difficult government during the last few months. During these months we made efforts to do our duty in the face of increased difficulties and unforseen obstacles every day. Being aware of the great responsibilities of the executive in the work of our complex democracy, we acted daily to consolidate and not to erode, to enrich and not to confuse the necessary political and social solidarities in the face of the present crisis; which, if it is to be overcome must bring out a high degree of consensus and cooperation from the members of the government who were assembled to perform clear and precise (?tasks).

Confronted by episodes of inadmissible personal incompatibility among the ministers who exacerbated the political polemics inside the coalition while the prime minister was in the United States on a difficult mission -- episodes whose gravity it is impossible to dismiss -- I deemed it my precise duty to claim with clarity and coherence the constitutional prerogatives of the prime minister -- to whom, according to the letter of the Constitution, is entrusted the task of conducting the government's general policy -- of guaranteeing its collegial status and of assuming the consequences and responsibilities.

Since, despite views expressed by me immediately on the violation of the principle of collegiality and ministerial coresponsibility, it was not possible to attain adequate remedies to the grave situation; I drew the necessary and dutiful conclusions and tendered the government's resignation, and offered to explain to Parliament the government's institutional and political condition. In absolute deference to the will of the president of the republic, I will refer immediately to the chairmen of the two chambers to ask them to set as soon as possible a date for my explanation to Parliament. [end recording]

There is only one precedent of a government returning to the chambers; this happened in the fifth Rumor government during Leone's presidency. As you heard, Spadolini's mediation failed, but President Pertini refused to accept the resignation at such a delicate moment in the country's life. This is the 41st crisis since the beginning of the republic, and the 7th in the Pertini presidency. It is now up to Parliament to examine the political solutions of the situation.

Further Developments

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 11 -- Italian President Sandro Pertini rejected this evening Prime Minster Giovanni Spadolini's resignation. Spadolini will now have to appear before Parliament to report on the state of his five-party government coalition which was on the brink of a crisis today.

After meeting with Pertini, Spadolini said that he worked day after day to consolidate this government and added that he was obliged to present his resignation because of "inadmissible personal conflicts between ministers", Christian Democrat Treasury Minister Nino Andreatta and Socialist Finance Minister Rino Formica.

Spadolini said that he felt it (?was his) specific duty "to stress the constitutional prerogatives of the prime minister who is required to direct the government's general policy: [words indistinct] its unity and assume the necessary responsibilities".

Spadolini said that, given Pertini's rejection, he will now go to the speakers of the Senate and lower house to set a date in Parliament as soon as possible. The prime minister added that he explicitly had asked for the resignation of Andreatta and Formica, adding that Andreatta "said he was willing."

Parliament Debate Set

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 12 -- Premier Giovanni Spadolini is to open parliamentary debate on the political situation of his government today, after his resignation was rejected by head of state Sandro Pertini Thursday.

Spadolini will go before the Chamber of Deputies this afternoon and it will be his remarks that will set off the debate which is expected to continue tomorrow.

The Senate has been convened for this evening when the text of Spadolini's address to the house will be delivered. The Senate debate is expected to begin Monday afternoon.

Pertini's decision to turn down the premier's resignation and send the government to the Parliament for a clarifying debate was welcomed by both the majority and the opposition forces as introducing an element of clarity into an extremely complex and confused political situation.

It was generally felt that not only had Pertini channelled the crisis onto the correct constitutional tracks, but that the coalition partners would now have to shoulder their responsibilities with the yes of the nation upon them.

The polemics of recent days threatened to present a government crisis as the result of a personal rift between ministers, thereby leaving the true causes of the dispute in the dark. In fact, the coalition government's underlying problem lies in the differing ways two key partners -- the Christian Democrats and the Socialists -- view economic policy. Now these two parties must clarify their thinking before the Parliament and the nation, leaving no space for equivocation or compromise.

Political observers were being cautious about making any predictions as to the outcome of the parliamentary debate. It is not only the Spadolini government which is at stake but the legislature itself. The debate should not last long. A vote is expected in two or three days. If the vote is favorable to the government a reshuffle will be inevitable. If it goes against the government, another long and difficult crisis will be opened.

JOINT EFFORT AVERTS PLANNED ETA ATTEMPT ON POPE

LD091322 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1130 GMT 9 Nov 82

[Text] Felipe Gonzalez, future prime minister of Spain, telephoned French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy last Friday night to warn him about the possibility of some spectacular action being staged by ETA-Military against the pope's visit to Spain. This is reported today by the Madrid Paper DIARIO-16, which goes on to say that this call led to the mounting of an operation by the French against the terrorist organization, an operation which culminated in the reported arrest of three ETA leaders, according to sources in the French Socialist Party.

The same newspaper report goes on to say that Spanish Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo briefed King Juan Carlos about police fears of a possible ETA attack on the pope. Persons who spent part of the weekend with the king have said that Don Juan Carlos was aware of such suspicions, having been told of them by the prime minister's office.

DIARIO-16 cites Spanish police sources as saying that police establishments received a telex several days ago from the directorate of police warning of a possible attack on the pope. The telex gave orders for security measures to be stepped up and provided details on two or three persons, among them an Italian and a Frenchman. According to this police telex, the attack on the pope was likely to occur on the final stage of his trip. The fact is that when the pope went to Loyola, the scheduled landing site for the helicopter was changed, as was the inerary.

The newspaper also says that the ETA man arrested in France, Ansola Larranaga, must have had something very important to hide when he ignored the French gendarmes' order to halt and thereby laid himself open to their shots as he tried to flee. This is believed to be the first time the police in that country have opened fire on ETA terrorists.

Felipe Gonzalez's phone call to the French prime minister is reported to have been made because the Spanish police uncovered documents naming the exact place where the pope was due to land in the Basque country.

DIARIO-16 also reports that the Spanish Foreign Ministry is expected to seek the extradition of the two ETA-Militar leaders arrested last Saturday in St Jean de Luz, Jose Luis Ansola Larranaga and Carlos Ibarguren Aguirre. However, sources at the ministry are sceptical about the possibility of the two ETA men being handed over to the Spanish police. They beleive that this case will go the same way as other extradition attempts.

GONZALEZ ON PARTY, GOVERNMENT POLITICAL ROLES

[Unattributed report on Spanish Socialist Workers Party Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez 7 November Press Conference in Madrid: "Socialist Federal Committee Agrees: Party Will Not Influence Government"]

[Text] Madrid -- Spanish Socialist Workers Party Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez met with newsmen yesterday at lunchtime to tell them about the extraordinary meeting of the party's Federal Committee devoted to an analysis of the elections results and the political situation in general.

The meeting was not designed to adopt resolutions, but to examine future prospects, according to Felipe Gonzalez. "I observed that all members of the committee are regarding the election victory with a high degree of tranquillity, and we will be busy preparing for and thinking about future strategy, having fulfilled the forecasts of previous Federal Committee meetings."

In his address to the Federal Committee, the Socialist leader presented his own analysis of the situation, which was followed by a debate free of polemics or tensions. The major part of the secretary general's speech was based on what he believes should be the nature of relations between the government and the party.

"The party is very clear about the differences between the party's political role and the political role of the government, which is the government of the entire nation -- not just of Socialist Party members and voters, but also of those who did not vote for us." He said that the Socialist parliamentary group will perform a supervisory role with respect to the executive. He said that it would maintain special relations between Parliament and the government and between Parliament and the trade unions.

Testing Regulations

Asked about the possibility of the Basque and Catalonian Socialists forming their own parliamentary group, as in previous legislative periods, he replied that "this topic has been discussed, but of course we do not belive that it is a priority. At present, I personally do not believe that it would be good to introduce modifications into regulations that tock 5 years to establish in Parliament. These regulations must be tested and, if we subsequently see that they contain errors, then we will consider correcting them."

With regard to the timetable for the transfer of powers and its possible modifications, Felipe Gonzalez said: "I have expressed my opinion and no contrary opinions have been expressed, so that I believe that the king's inaugural speech, the King's Speech, will take place at the appointed time. I believe that nothing of importance must take place at parliament before the King's Speech, because this speech marks the start of the legislative term. Therefore, it would be inappropriate for it to be preceded by a decision as important as the new prime minister's investiture. I believe that the timetable is fine, although I understand the arguments of those who belive that it is illogical that the King's Speech be delivered in the presence of an incumbent government. The throne must be above the interplay of the political parties."

Respectful With PCE

Felipe seemed reserved in his answers to questions about the Communist Party: "One must be respectful with regard to other parties' crises." He said that "Santiago Carrillo has been a very important factor in the Spanish transition. There has been within the PCE a certain crisis of identity, a crisis that could be considered historic, because the PCE proceeded from a very different blueprint for society from its present one with an internal organization that was also very different from the one it now needs. However, I do not want to enter into this subject, because I believe that political parties in a state of crisis must have the respect of the other political forces."

Having said that he plans to have talks with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, though no date has been set for the meeting, Felipe Gonzalez said that the party leaders' decision is "to create a broad majority so as to achieve the autonomy of the socialist blueprint." He added that an open debate has begun on the government's future relations with the general union of workers and stressed the idea of clearly defining government and party roles "so that they do not influence each other."

Strengthening Majority

Felipe Gonzalez, who remained silent when asked about the possible composition of the future Socialist government, also said: "I have made a reappraisal of the social majority for change, of which I talked so much during the election campaign, and have compared it with the resulting political spectrum. When there is so much talk about a two-party system and some people complain that if they had united we would not have won, I am reminded of something somebody said about no matter how the figures are juggled, there are still 3 million votes missing. This is why we will continue to struggle to strengthen this majority and the institutions that defend the essence of a state."

NEW PCE LEADER IGLESIAS HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

[Unattributed report on PCE Secretary General Gerardo Iglesias 7 November press conference in Madrid: "I Am Not Going To Change PCE Policy"]

[Text] Madrid — "I was elected secretary general not to change PCE policy but to implement the results of the 10th party congress." This was said by the PCE's new secretary general, who continued: "I will defend a Eurocommunist concept of the party with all my strengthen."

The new PCE secretary general does not consider himself more efficient than Santiago Carrillo: "Carrillo resigned. Somebody had to replace him and the Executive Committee suggested me." He said he has profound respect for the outgoing secretary general both as a person and as a politician, "but leaving that aside, I am now PCE secretary general." Gerardo Iglesias stressed that he will define the policy that the PCE will pursue from now on: From now on, I am the new secretary general and nobody can tell me what line I must follow."

Asked about what changes will take place within the party, Gerardo Iglesias said that he does not have a clear idea of what changes he will propose, but since the outset, he was certain he would not agree to be secretary general a priori "without proposing it myself."

Asked whether he considered his a "transitional" secretary generalship, he said that this is something that does not worry him at all. "Such matters will depend on what I manage or do not manage to do. However, if I were to notice it first, I would resign myself."

In his opinion, the PCE has all kinds of problems — internal, regarding communications, economic restrictions and shortcomings in its penetration of society — for which the new secretary general will seek methods of better internal and external communication as well as the necessary changes in the various statutory bodies. "Those who have left can return, but not because I am secretary general but because the party's doors have always been open and we will now try to open them still wider."

Criticism of Pro-Soviets

With regard to the Eastern bloc countries, Mr Iglesias said that he would continue to assess them critically — "very critically." With regard to the model of society in which they live, and particularly those within the PCE who are closer to this model of society, namely the pro-Soviets, Gerardo Iglesias said: "Basically what I believe is that one belongs to the PCE for the sake of a blueprint. This blueprint was approved at the 10th congress.

"There may be people who for sentimental or other reasons may feel closer, but as long as in their day-to-day practice what they implement and what they work for is the eurocommunist policy approved at the 10th congress, nobody will bother me within the PCE."

Gerardo Iglesias concluded by saying that "I have no intention of staying 22 years" at the head of the PCE, which is how long Carrillo remained secretary general.

SPANISH CENTER RECOVERY NEEDS 'RADICAL CHANGES'

PM091613 Madrid YA in Spanish 5 Nov 82 p 11

[Unattributed report: "UCD Executive Announces Radical Changes in Party"]

[Text] The Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] National Executive Committee met yesterday to analyze the results of the latest general election, which are highly unfavorable to the UCD tickets. The meeting was devoted wholly to this analysis, leaving decisionmaking for a meeting to be held 15 November.

In a press note issued at the end of the meeting, the Executive Committee "wishes to express its thanks for the good 1.5 million voters who confirmed their confidence in the UCD, while at the same time conveying the party's decision to remain loyal to that electorate in its parliamentary activity. The committee also wished to give thanks for the UCD members' collaboration through their support in the election campaign.

Through its parliamentary group, the UCD intends to maintain monitoring and constructive yet critical opposition to the coming Socialist government's conduct.

The Executive Committee reaffirms its conviction that a center option is necessary in order to stablize Spanish democracy. It also believes that the results of the latest election confirm the opinion repeatedly expressed by the UCD that an electoral weakening of the center leads to a Socialist victory. The rebuilding of a strong center option is therefore necessary in order to ensure future government alternatives in Spain.

The results of the latest general election make it advisable to introduce radical changes in the party's concept and organizational structure, as well as to outline an electoral strategy for the next local and regional elections -- aspects for which the corresponding reports and proposals will be prepared for the Executive Committee's next meeting. ELLEMANN-JENSEN MIDEAST TOUR: CENSURES ISRAEL

[Ritzaus Bureau dispatch: "Ellemann-Jensen Directs Tough New Attack on Israel"]

[Text] Beirut -- On Friday [5 November], Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen directed tough new criticism against Israel for having shown no flexibility over the Middle East peace process. At the end of a 2-day visit to Lebanon on behalf of the EEC, he stressed how important it is that all parties in the Middle East conflict be heard. It was in this context that the foreign minister mentioned the possibility of a visit to Denmark by PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat and pointed out that it is important to listen to the views of the PLO.

Commenting on the reproaches he has received because he is not visiting Israel on his current trip the minister said that Israel's rejection of President Reagan's peace plan, which is supported by the 10 EEC nations, indicates that the present time is not right for a visit to Israel. As an example of the EEC'S cooler relations with the Jewish state, he said that a finance protocol between the EEC and Israel has been postponed for the time being.

Ellemann-Jensen said that his Friday meetings with Lebanese President Amin Al-Jumayyil and Prime Minister Shafiq al-Wazzan, were a political guesture by the EEC nations. "It is important that we give political indications that the EEC nations believe in peaceful development in Lebanon. During my visit, I had my belief confirmed that Lebanon is on the right road and that democracy will survive."

The foreign minister said that Lebanon will be offered two sums of 50 million European currency units (a good 800 million kroner) through the European Investment Bank. He was obviously much affected by the devastation caused by the war, but voiced his conviction that "Lebanon is such a strong country that it will get back on its feet again."

Today Uffe Ellemann-Jensen will proceed to Jordan, where we will listen to King Husayn's thoughts on Palestinian self-rule in a federation with Jordan, which, he said, "holds the key to a lasting peace in the Middle East."

HOME GUARD NEEDS MORE MONEY; DEFENSE SAVINGS

[Michael Ehrenreich report: "Minister Seeks Money"]

[Text] Defense Minister Hans Engell is looking for more money for the Home Guard, which has economic problems owing to the growing interest in it reflected by the number of applicants, which has now reached 1,100 per year. The money will be provided before the total defense budget for 1983 is discussed.

"The Home Guard's problems are primarily due to the gratifying level of interest in it -- but also to the fact that the majority of the applicants have not been soldiers and therefore have not received any defense training. For this reason, the Home Guard's problems must be viewed within Denmark's total defense framework," said the defense minister, who thinks it vitally important that the Home Guard's broad age, social and geographic spectrum be preserved.

The Home Guard's budget under the multiparty defense settlement is based on a strength of 75,000 men, but this figure had grown to 77,400 by 1 October this year, said a Home Guard report presented by Hans Engell to the so-called 11-man committee established to monitor the defense settlement.

At the meeting, the Social Democrats put forward their proposals for defense savings of 200 million kroner in 1983 and 400 million in 1984. For the committee's next meeting in a couple of weeks, the Social Democrats will work on proposals regarding where these savings are to be made. At the same time, the minister has promised to maintain the status quo for the defense forces by maintaining activities and strength levels.

Anker Jorgensen, Social Democratic Folketing group chairman and former prime minister, yesterday rejected a proposal from the Radical Liberals for joint proposals for defense savings from the two parties. "The Radical Liberals have an easy time with cuts. Together with the government, they are ready to make cuts in all fields, and so they will simply have to vote in favor of our proposals," Anker Jorgensen said.

SOVIET ICEBREAKER CHASED FROM MILITARY ZONE

[Text] Tromso, Norway, Nov 10 (AFP) -- A Soviet icebreaker which had ventured into a military zone off the coast of Norway was forced to back off after a Norwegian Coast Guard vessel threatened to open fire. The Coast Guard was alerted to the ship's presence by a Norwegian pilot station which had received a request for help from the ship's captain. Warned by the Coast Guard, the icebreaker backtracked to just outside the forbidden zone where it then dropped anchor claiming mechanical difficulties. The ship left Norwegian waters only after the Coast Guard withdrew its threat to open fire.

EUROLEFT MEETING SUPPORTS LABOR PARTY STAND

[Teruje Svabo report: "Labor Party Receives Support in Missile Affair"]

[Text] "Not only understanding, but support." With these words, Norwegian Labor Party Deputy Chairman Einar Forde described the reception given the Labor Party position on the missile affair by its sister parties in the NATO nations. Forde said that the Social Democratic parties take a pessimistic view of the two superpowers' willingness to negotiate in Geneva. "We are growing concerned that the superpowers are now developing a strategy in which a limited nuclear war would be possible," Forde said.

During the weekend [6, 7 November] the Labor Party deputy chairman attended a meeting in Amsterdam between Social Democratic parties from Denmark, Belgium, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, West Germany, Britain and Norway. These meetings have been held over the last 2 years to discuss disarmament and East-West relations. The parties will now meet more often to discuss these questions. The weekend's meeting was the first at which all the parties taking part now find themselves in opposition in their respective parliaments.

Of the meeting's contents, Forde said the Social Democrats are now questioning the superpowers' willingness to achieve real results at the Geneva negotiations. They are asking themselves whether the United States is taking the negotiations stand of the dual decision seriously enough and have noted that in the Soviet Union military considerations have gained the upper hand over political considerations.

"There is considerable concern in our parties at the lack of progress in the Geneva negotiations," Forde said, adding: "it is my impression that we will have to see results from the talks in the first half of 1983, or at least clear signs of movement in the right direction. There is a clear light on how long the deadlock can go on, bearing in mind the strength of public opinion on this issue. Here we note that not only the peace movement but also the churches in the NATO nations are playing an ever more central role."

For his own part, the Labor Party deputy chairman also believes that the negotiations in Geneva have little chance of success unless French and British nuclear arms are included in them. He has the impression that it is increasingly important for the Geneva talks to be seen in a more global context.

"There is growing concern in the Social Democratic parties over the fact that the superpowers are busy developing their arms technology and strategy to the point at which a limited nuclear war becomes possible. For the smaller European nations, this is the most unacceptable alternative imaginable. In my opinion, it is therefore important that the Geneva talks not only embrace medium-range nuclear arms but are also viewed in the context of the strategic arms talks."

At the weekend meeting there was major concern over the French Government's decision to produce neutron bombs. "The decision was condemned unanimously at the meeting. We agreed that each of us would write to the French Government expressing our clear protest against the production of these weapons. A West German representative put it like this: We are opposed to both French and U.S. neutron bombs," Forde said.

On the current controversy surrounding the NATO dual decision, Forde said that the matter is being handled differently in different NATO nations, but the Norwegian standpoint met with the support of those taking part in the meeting. He stressed that there was agreement at the meeting on the rejection of all proposals for accelerated deployment as a means of exerting pressure on the Soviet Union at the talks.

Norway's Christian People's Party has also been discussing the missile affair. Twenty six party officials have written to the party's parliamentary leader, Kjell Magne Bondevik, calling on him to support the three Storting deputies from the party who opposed the dual decision in a Storting vote last spring. However, there is little reason to expect more Christian People's Party deputies to follow the example of the three in future votes.

The Swedish reply states that Sweden can take part in operations only within the UN framework. Sweden is already responsible for a UN hospital in southern Lebanon.

Lebanon now intends to ask Thailand, Spain and Colombia to reinforce the international peace force.

THATCHER ON GCHQ SPY, DAMAGE INVESTIGATION

LD111650 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1639 GMT 11 Nov 82

[Text] Geoffrey Prime had access to information of the utmost secrecy for a period of 15 years to 1977, the prime minister disclosed in the Commons today.

She announced that the Security Commission is to investigate the circumstances of security breaches involving the Russian language expert sentenced on Tuesday to 35 years jail for spying. Mrs Thatcher also told MP's of positive vettings carried out on Prime. A review of the vetting was held in 1974, she said, after the break up of first marriage.

"Nothing arose... to put in doubt his fitness for access to classified information and his certificate was renewed," Mrs Thatcher said.

Mrs Thatcher faced a barrage of questions about what one Labour MP Mr Ted Leadbitter, described as a "disastrous shambles" at Cheltenham -- where Prime worked at the crucially secret communications headquarters.

Mr Leadbitter, MP for Hartlepool, demanded "a purge" as well as an inquiry. An both Michael Foot, opposition leader and Dr David Owen, for the Social Democrats, called for a new system of parliamentary control of security. But Mrs Thatcher said: "I believe the present arrangements are most appropriate." There would be as full as possible report to the Commons after the Security Commission investigation and a debate, promised the prime minister during later questions.

Three major questions were raised by the case, Mrs Thatcher said in her statement. "The first is how Prime was able to be engaged and retained upon highly classified work and to escape notice as a spy for so long -- and whether this was due to some defect in procedures which remains to be corrected. "The second is to ascertain precisely how much and what information Prime passed to the Russians and what damage was done. "The third is whether Prime knows of any others in the public service who were or who may have been involved in espionage.

Mrs Thatcher outlined Prime's earlier career in the R.A.F., which ended on July 31 1968.

"Earlier that year he applied from Berlin to join Government Communications Headquarters", she said. "Although he had been positively vetted while in the Royal Air Force he was positively vetted again at GCHQ. "He was certified for access to classified information and joined GCHQ in September 1968 as a Russian translator in the grade of linguist specialist, broadly equivalent to executive officer. "The highest grade he ever reached was the next grade up which is broadly equivalent to higher executive officer. He was positively vetted again in 1973, after that vetting was reviewed again in 1974 following the breakup of his first marriage. Nothing arose on either occasion to put in doubt his fitness for access to classified information, and his certificate was renewed," Mrs Thatcher said.

"In the course of his employment both in the Royal Air Force and in GCHQ, Prime came to have access to information ranging from the sensitive to matters of the utmost secrecy. He resigned from the government service for personal reasons in Septmeber 1977, and has not since then been employed in the public service or in any other position which would give him access to classified information," Mrs Thatcher said.

After describing the arrest of Prime and events leading up to his trial, Mrs Thatcher said that after he resigned from GCHQ in September 1977, there were two further contacts with his Russian controller.

"He went to Vienna two and a half years later in May 1980 taking with him photographic material and handwritten notes derived from the last period of his government service. Then he was summoned to East Berlin in November 1981, and was closely questioned. He was urged to seek further employment in government service. But did not do so.

"On one or other of these occasions he was given further espionage equipment, but he did not use it."

Mrs Thatcher continued: "Over a period of 15 years to 1977, during which he was engaged on highly classified work, Prime had access to information of the utmost secrecy. On his own admission from the beginning of 1968 at least until 1980 he passed a lot of information to the Russians. That information must have alerted them to the state of our knowledge of certain important aspects of Russian defence arrangements, and to the ways in which that knowledge was obtained.

"It is not only British interests which have been damaged. The damage extends to the interests of the United States Government," Mrs Thatcher said. "And of course the damage to our own and United States interests is damage to the Atlantic alliance as a whole.

"There is, however, no evidence that Prime had access to any classified information about our own or allied military dispositions or intentions, or about nuclear weapons, or to any information which could have endangered the lives of agents."

After referring to the "three major questions" raised by the case Mrs Thatcher said: "Investigation so far has yieled no evidence to contradict Prime's own statement that no others were involved in his activities.

"But now that the trial proceedings are complete, all these questions must be further and exhaustively investigated," Mrs Thatcher said.

Now that the trial was over, after consulting the chairman of the Security Commission and the opposition leader, Mr Foot, "I have decided to refer these matters to the Security Commission.

"The terms of reference will be: 'To investigate the circumstances in which breaches of security have, or may have, occurred arising out of the case of Geoffrey Arthur Prime, who was convicted on 10 November 1982 of offences under the Official Secrets Act 1911, and to advise in the light of that investigation whether any change in security arrangements is necessary or desirable.'"

Mrs Thatcher added: "These terms of reference will enable the commission to inquire into all the questions which this case raises. The commission's findings will be laid before the House to the fullest extent compatible with national security."

DAILY TELEGRAPH Views Trial

PM111041 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 11 Nov 82 pp 10-11

[Excerpts] Geoffrey Prime, 44 a former employee of the government's secret communications headquarters at Cheltenham, jailed yesterday for spying for the Russians, was only caught because of his taste for sex with little girls.

After he confessed to three sex attacks police searched his home and discovered "material which suggested he was involved in activities even more grave," said Sir Michael Havers, QC attorney-general, prosecuting, at The Old Bailey.

In his wallet they found a code-pad a document explaining how to handle micro-dots, details of radio frequencies, and a top secret memorandum.

The police also took possession of a powerful radio, two recording tapes, a black briefcase, a carrier bag containing notebooks; and 26 envelopes pre-addressed to East Berlin.

Sir Michael said that in the course of Prime's employment, both in the RAF and in the government service, he came to have access to information ranging from the simply sensitive to matters of the "very highest" secrecy. Over a period of 15 years he had admitted passing secrets in Berlin, Vienna, Potsdam and London that had caused "exceptional grave damage."

At one stage, the press and public were excluded for 20 minutes while Sir Michael told the court, in camera, "the deep gravity of what Prime did," Before doing so, Sir Michael said: "There has been much wild speculation, most of which is unsupported by the evidence, about the nature of the damage for which he is responsible, especially in relation to nuclear warheads and endangering the lives of agents. "I repeat there is no evidence to support speculations of this kind."

Prime was first interviewed about his espionage activities in June this year, but he simply told police: "I don't know where you got that information from, but that certainly isn't true, I can assure you." But he was later more forthcoming. During four hours of questioning he admitted receiving 2,000 pounds from the Russians, but claimed he never got any further than considering working for them.

At a later interview he explained that in September 1977 he had booked flights to Helsinki on two occasions with a view to living in Russia, but his regard for his wife and her children prevented him from going through with the plan.

During that interview with the police, Prime said that in 1974 he had been given, via his sister, a briefcase with a secret compartment containing spying equipment. The plain black briefcase and its secret compartment were produced in court and the method of opening it, removing two screws, in the handle, was demonstrated.

Prime was interviewed twice more, said Sir Michael, but he repeated his denials. Then there was a "dramatic change." Suddenly, he told two officers: "Yes, at 4 o'clock today June 26, 1982, I now wish to tell you the whole truth of this tragic affair. I cannot go on talking about my wife whilst I am continuing to tell lies. It will take a long time, could we have a short break, then I'll start from January 1968, when this affair started."

The statement which followed was so long it was taken over two days. The salient features, which emerged, were that his first contact with Russian agents was not in 1974, but in January 1968, when he was stationed in Berlin.

"According to that statement Prime began to feel sympathy for the Soviet regime in the mid-60s, and when returning from leave handed a note to a Soviet officer manning a checkpoint into West Berlin indicating that he wished to make contact." Later he found a metallic cylinder attached to the door of his car. It contained a note directing him to Freidrichstrasse station, where he was met by Russian agents. He explained that he wanted to give them any information they wanted.

"Thereafter Prime met his contacts Igor and Valya regularly until July 1968 when he left the RAF. He told them the nature of his work and revealed all the information which was available to him. He used a miniature camera to photograph RAF Catow's telephone directory and delivered photographs together with a sample of classified material to his Russian controller. Prime told his controller that he was thinking of applying for employment as a linguist in the civil service and was encouraged to pursue his application. He returned to England in July 1968, and was successful in his job application, being told to report for duty in London on Sept 30, 1968.

"Before starting work he returned to East Berlin and received extensive training in the arts of the spy. He was taught the method of secret writing which allows invisible messages in code to be overwritten on seemingly innocuous letters. He was taught how to use a miniature camera for photographing documents. He was taught how to receive coded radio transmissions and how to receive and handle microdots. He was told the dead letter box procedure for conveying information."

When Prime returned to England he brought with him the briefcase containing the code pads for deciphering messages sent to him by radio, and to encipher messages sent back to the Russians, secret writing paper on which to write encoded messages, East German-addressed envelopes to carry the secret messages in invisible code and 400 pounds sterling. He was given the codename Rowlands and a password to be used when meeting contacts. In reply to the contact saying: "I believe we met in Pittsburgh in 1968," Prime was to reply: "No, at that time I was in Berlin.

Sir Michael continued: "Once he started work in London, Prime regularly conveyed information to the Russians and received information from them usually by radio.

"In autumn 1969, he was told by radio message to go to a secret hiding place in Esher, near a lake. He went and received a few hundred pounds in sterling and a letter congratulating him on his progress. In May 1970, he took photographs of documents, which he had taken with the miniature camera, to Abbey Wood in London and left them at a secret hiding place in a wood. In the summer of 1971, he collected more money and more spying materials at a pick-up point near Banstead Station in Surrey. In 1972 or 1973, he mislaid his one-time pads (code pads) and was forced to send a letter to East Germany in invisible writing, in plain text, explaining the loss.

"According to Prime, contact was lost until 1974, when Soviet agents left a briefcase at his sister's home. This part of Prime's statement is confirmed by his sister who remembers a man and a woman who spoke in broken English delivering a parcel. She opened the parcel and saw the briefcase, which was apparently empty. In fact it was the replica of the briefcase Prime had been given in August 1968, and had spying equipment and 400 pounds in the secret compartment.

"In the spring of 1975, while still in London, Prime was given a briefing by his employers in order to receive and understand fresh material of a higher security classification. He reported immediately to his controller in East Berlin. His controller arranged a series of meetings in Vienna which took place in September 1975. Prime took with him photographic copies of highly secret material and microfiche cards of an equally sensitive nature. He received 700 pounds or 800 pounds in sterling.

"Prime flew to Vienna again in May 1976. Between September 1975 and May 1976 he had been regularly sending details of top secret information. He took with him in May 1976 more photographed documents he had had access to whilst in London, and explained the nature of his new job at Cheltenham.

"He had, in fact, been transferred from London to Cheltenham in March 1976. At one of the meetings in Vienna in May 1976, Prime was informed that should he ever wish to defect he would be given a pension and the rank of colonel. He was given 1,000 pounds before he returned to England.

"Prime was promoted in 1976, and on the first of November 1976 he became section head, which gave him access to a wider and even more secret range of material. As a section head he regularly attended meetings at which matters of the utmost secrecy were discussed. Between his return from Vienna in May 1976 and his resignation on Sept 28, 1977, Prime took 15 rolls of film amounting to about 500 photographs of top secret documents.

"Prime claimed that by September 1977, the pressure of living a double life got too much for him. He had married in June 1977 and taken over the care of his new wife's three children. He decided to defect by flying to Helsinki and indeed booked flights on Sept 11 and Sept 20, but on each occasion did not go through with it. According to Prime he had no further contact with Russian agents until he was telephoned in April, 1980, and asked to go to Vienna. He flew there on May 16, 1980, taking with him the 15 rolls of film of top secret documents, together with handwritten notes. He was taken to a Russian cruise ship on the Danube for two or three days and questioned at length about the material he had brought with him. He was given 600 pounds and flew back to England. In October, Prime claimed that he was again contacted by telephone and agreed to go to Berlin for a further meeting. He flew to Berlin on Nov 16 and was taken to Potsdam in East Germany where he was closely questioned about allied activities which were top secret. When the debriefing was finished he was given 4,000 pounds and taken back to Berlin. Prime indicated that the one time pads and the secret writing pads which the police had seized were given to him either in Vienna in 1980 or at Potsdam in 1981. He claimed he had not used any of them, nor had he he had any further contact with Russian agents."

Sir Michael said Prime ended his statement saying: "Looking back over the entire period I deeply regret the extent of the betrayal manifested by my activities, which were in breach of the trust placed in me by my government. I believe that I first embarked on these activities partly as a result of a misplaced idealistic view of Soviet Socialism which was compounded by basic psychological problems within myself. These problems had made me susceptible to the type of propaganda which I became aware of during my service in West Berlin. I am also deeply ashamed and find it difficult to express my remorse in words in relation to the anguish and suffering which I have caused for my wife and family."

Before requesting the court to go into camera, Sir Michael paid tribute to the officers of West Mercia police who interviewed Prime. "The responsible services had nothing but praise for the masterly way in which Det. Chief Supt. David Cole, Det. Chief Insp. Peter Picken and police officers under them coped with what is the gravest investigation they will ever be likely to undertake. In an unfamiliar field, they worked with remarkable diligence and very great care."

Lord Lane, lord chief justice, interrupted by asking the attorney-general: "The information this man gave became more and more important and dangerous to the services of this country, is that true?" Sir Michael agreed that it became more true as Prime's spying career continued.

When the court came out of camera Mr George Carman, QC, defence counsel, told the lord chief justice: "My client may now be able to see that a civilised system of justice affords him the right to be properly defended in a country whose interests he has damaged, whereas the irony of the case is that the country whose interests he sought to serve would have denied him such rights." Dealing with what he described as matters of the "greatest public importance," Mr Carman emphasised that Prime's espionage activities were conducted by him in collusion with the Russian intelligence services alone. No other collegue at GCHQ or indeed any other citizen of Britain or any Western power was in any way involved, directly or indirectly in his activities.

"Having betrayed his country and confessed his guilt freely, he expressly authorises me to state that he is anxious to cooperate after sentence with the authorities in furnishing any further information that he possibly can in any subsequent interviews that may be sought, so that the task of repairing the damage should be continued."

Mr Carman invited Lord Lane not to consider Prime as a totally ruthless and rationally motivated spy. He pointed out that he had an opportunity to defect to the Soviet Union when he resigned from Cheltenham and failed to do so. Also, unlike some of the major post-war spies including Philby, Burgess and Maclean, there was not in Prime's case any pre-arranged escape plan or route with the Russians. He had no false passport and every trip abroad was carried out using his real passport. Lord Lane intervened: "Did he really need one?" Mr Carman replied: "If he went to places like Vienna, it may have been likely for the Russians to have provided him with a false passport."

Mr Carman said Prime had lied to police because he knew that even if he was imprisoned for the sexual offences, any term would leave him a lifeline to see his wife and step-children eventually.

Prime had described in great detail his recruitment and training by the Russians, and had also described the Russian intelligence service to police. He had told quite voluntarily of the payments he had received and the times on which the Russians had made contact. "He gave the British authorities every possible co-operation in enabling them to try to understand the gravity of what he had done and assess the damage that he had perpetrated." Mr Carman added: "His paymasters did not think so highly of him that they had arranged for his escape." Again Lord Lane interrupted, saying: "He was much more valuable here."

Counsel said Prime had no access to fresh information from the autumn of 1977 when he left Cheltenham. Although he went to Potsdam in 1981 and was interviewed by Russian intelligence, they were technical questions, and he was unable to help them. "Persistent attempts were made by the Russians to encourage him to try to rejoin the government services at Cheltenham or the Army. They even tried to persuade him to try to join the security services. But one having made the decision to resign, he made absolutely no effort to rejoin again."

Reactions of U.S. Intelligence

PM111055 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 11 Nov 82 p 36

[Dispatch by David Shears: "Congress Curb on Sharing Secrets Feared"]

[Text] Washington [no date as received] -- Senior Central Intelligence Agency officials are worried that Congress might seize on the Cheltenham security breach to impose tighter surveillance of their work and curb the sharing of American Secrets with Britain.

Professionals in the Washington intelligence community view the Prime case as serious, but nobody believes that the Cheltenham "mole" betrayed military secrets such as the location of NATO nuclear warheads or the state of readiness of every NATO division.

"It is most unlikely that he would have had access to anything of the sort," said Mr George Carver, a retired CIA deputy. Mr Carver, now working as a senior fellow of the George-Town University Centre for Strategic and International Studies, said that although he had no direct knowledge of Prime's "leaks" to the Russians, the case was certainly less damaging than, for example, the Philby defection.

Washington sources who cannot be named say the kind of Russian messages and signals that would have crossed Prime's desk were less "cosmic" in their security classification. Typical of the material Prime was given to translate would have been coded military signals passing between Russian Army units. Much of this would have been routine traffic.

Mr Carver said that Prime would not necessarily have known how this material had been obtained, but the very fact that he had it must have been of great interest to his Soviet "case officer" or local spymaster. By examining the messages Prime was translating, the KGB would have been able to determine which of their codes had been broken. This in turn would have enabled Moscow to attempt "disinformation" -- the deliberate feeding of misleading material to the West.

Mr Carver suggested that Prime might have been useful to his Russian masters by telling them which of the messages he handled had aroused particular interest among his superiors. "This would have given the Soviets an indication of the lines of inquiry Western intelligence was pursuing at any given moment," he said.

A recent WASHINGTON POST report that NATO military secrets had been betrayed was not taken seriously by the Washington intelligence agencies, but CIA chiefs fear that it might prompt Congress to enforce President Carter's 1978 order requiring tighter congressional surveillance of their activities. When this order was issued, the CIA felt its secrets were no longer protected since they might "leak" from briefings on Capitol Hill. London, therefore, hesitated to pass on some British intelligence material.

In the wake of the Prime case, CIA officials fear that some Senators will try to restrict the two-way flow of intelligence between America and Britain for fear or betrayal. Already it is said that some staff assistants of the Senate Intelligence Committee are "snapping at the heels" of Mr William Casey, the CIA director. So far these fears have not materialised.

Intelligence professionals on both sides say that Anglo-American cooperation continues unchanged and, in the words of one, [is] "as comfortable as can be."

TORY PARTY AIDE ON GEN ROGERS' 'NEW STRATEGY'

PM111141 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 11 Nov 82 p 18

[Article by Julian Critchley, Conservative MP for Aldershot, and a vice chairman of the party's Defense Committee: "Defending Europe by Attacking Attackers"]

[Excerpts] Gen Bernard Rogers, the supreme allied commander, Europe, is, for friend and foe alike, the personal embodiment of NATO in Europe in a sense that none of his political masters — who represent the various NATO countries -- can be. So when Rogers gives tongue on the trial of strength between East and West, he command attention. This he certainly did with his thoughtful speeches in Brussels and London on the urgent need to strengthen the non-nuclear defence of Europe.

NATO supremos of the 1950's, 1960's and 1970's had little cause for anxiety about government policies, except for the revolt of Gen De Gaulle against what he considered American pretensions, which led to the French forces' withdrawal from the organisation. Yet as early as 1960, Gen Norstad ran into an ugly scene when he came to address a big meeting at Coventry and was shouted down by local enthusiasts of the old Ban the Bomb Campaign.

That effervescence having died down for 20 years, NATO has enjoyed a tacit consensus as part of the accepted order of things, because of the belief, spoken or unspoken, which lasted far too long, that the nuclear superiority of the USA over the USSR would suffice to deter Russia from aggression in Central Europe. Alexander Haig, Roger's predecessor, was good at preaching to the converted, those who knew that NATO, by all the standards of traditional alliances, had been an enormous success.

The strategic situation is now quite transformed, and Gen Rogers has to meet, and overcome, the most serious challenge to the Atlantic alliance that we have yet seen. The Soviet Union has in the past five years achieved military superiority over the alliance in almost every field, and fear of nuclear war, which its propaganda has so ably exploited, has disturbed and divided public opinion in Western Europe and the United States.

It is providential that NATO's commander and spokesman in Europe today, who came to the job after three years as chief of staff of the United States Army, whose morale and efficiency he did much to restore after Vietnam, should be not only a great soldier but also a cultured and humane man able to understand and share the anxieties to which the disarmament movement responds. Let us see then how the present problems of European defence are viewed there, and how the remedies prescribed by Rogers in his recent speeches fit that view.

The best outline of the new strategy which I have seen is that of Senator Sam Nunn in a recent edition of the WASHINGTON QUARTERLY, the periodical published for the Department of Defence: "The question whether Europe is conventionally defensible against a massive non-nuclear Warsaw Pact attack has become more pressing than ever. As the credibility of NATO's strategic and theatre nuclear deterrent against conventional attack declines, the importance of a credible conventional deterrent grows. Conventional deterrence depends upon a viable conventional defence. Some defence analysts and military leaders now believe that a credible conventional defence is now possible through a number of new initiatives, including exploitation of new technologies, adoption of new operational doctrines, and better utilisation of Europe's substantial reserves of trained manpower for territorial defence."

He then goes on to outline the new doctrine "airland battle 2000" on which work is in progress. This doctrine (in contrast to the existing formula of "flexible response") is based on the principle that attack is the best method of defence, and, in immediate response to the first act of aggression, we would attack the follow-on, reinforcing echelons of Warsaw Pact forces before they cross the inter-German border, while also seizing the initiative early through defensive counter-attacks against pact forces on NATO territory.

We shall no doubt hear more of this strategy which capitalises on major advances in conventional warfare technology which have already taken place, including the great potential of micro-electronics. "It is neither possible nor necessary to match Soviet ground and tactical air forces on a one-for-one basis.... Instead NATO needs to procure conventional weapons that can be delivered accurately by existing aircraft and surface-to-surface rockets against fixed and mobile forces. Long-range conventional weapons are being developed that because of their greatly improved accuracy, now begin to approach the destructive potential of nuclear weapons."

I give these excerpts to show that, though the Warsaw Pact has built up a three-to-one superiority in battle tanks and artillery, and has 47 "equivalents of a division" available, without mobilisation or reinforcements in North and Central Europe compared with the Atlantic allies, 30 (including the French in Germany), the best strategists of the West believe that it would in theory be possible to hold up and disrupt a massive onslaught of conventional forces, for which the process of Soviet rearmament seems to be geared, without an early recourse to nuclear weapons.

To achieve that state of affairs two things are needed: the will and the money. And Gen Roger's proposals, as I read them, are precisely aimed at getting them. His case is that if the allied governments supplied the funds needed to finance the NATO goals to which they are committed for the period 1983-88, the necessary conventional force of deterrence could be achieved. For this an actual increase in real money of 4 percent in defence budgets as against the existing 3 percent already agreed -- but in many cases unfulfilled -- would, he reckons, be required.

There's the rub: For in a period of general recession one can see what a struggle there will be to extract the extra money from hard-pressed treasuries. But I have no doubt that it is right to support Rogers and with him the military committee of NATO, to which he and his fellow commanders are responsible in this important strategic evolution; and the nuclear disarmers in our parliaments, if they have not lost touch with reality, should welcome it.

Gen Rogers insists that, unless and until the Soviet Union can be induced to withdraw their menacing 300-odd SS20 missile launchers, NATO's decision to deploy the long-range Pershing II and cruise missiles must stand. The remaining 6,000 warheads in the US-European stockpile of short-range battlefield nuclear weapons could well be reduced, as he has suggested, as a contribution to an arms control agreement. What he and those planning the new strategy at Washington are seeking is to raise the nuclear threshold as high as possible. And that is the most one can hope for.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS HELD IN NICOSIA 11 Nov

NC111847 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 11 Nov 82

[Text] During today's meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks, discussion continued on issues of a procedural nature that had been raised during the meeting the day before yesterday. The Greek Cypriot side's representative, Mavrommatis, said before the meeting that the discussion of the procedural issues would be completed today and that a discussion would begin of certain constitutional points. Mavrommatis also said the territorial aspect will, in any case, be discussed before Christmas. The Greek Cypriot interlocutor also said we are passing through a delicate stage in the talks and that preparation is needed before the meetings. He added that the interlocutors will decide whether they should meet once or twice a week.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Onan, said the territorial aspect will be discussed at a later stage. In reply to a question, Onan said a new approach to the territorial aspect does not exist and added that the Turkish Cypriot side submitted its proposals on the territorial aspect long ago. A UN statement mentions that during today's meeting the exchange of views on certain consitutional aspects continued. The next meeting will be held Thursday.

SPOKESMAN ON TURKISH MOVES, INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[Text] In reply to observations that the Turkish Cypriot side is proceeding with granting deeds to Greek properties in the occupied territories, given the fact that the right to ownership is included in the summit agreements, and in reply to a question on whether the government intends to suspend the intercommunal talks and resort to the United Nations in order to denounce the Turkish Cypriot action, the republic's government spokesman said: The government has taken all necessary steps. In any case, he added, these Turkish Cypriot actions are illegal and are not recognized by anyone nor will they ever be recognized by the Cypriot Government.

In reply to a question on a suggestion by Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis for the participation of Western countries in the intercommunal dialogue, and following pan-Cypriot Labor Federation Secretary General Ziartidhis' observation that this suggestion was made after Kliridhis' recent meeting with the Greek prime minister, the government spokesman said that the Cypriot Government has absolutely no indication nor does it believe that Papandreou made such a suggestion. Finally, in reply to a question as to whether the government knows of a proposal for Famagusta's return in exchange for the lifting of the so-called economic embargo, the government spokesman said that such a proposal has not been recently submitted.

TURKISH CYPRIOT 'DEFECTORS' ARRESTED FOR SPYING

NC111054 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 11 Nov 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] The eight unemployed Turkish Cypriot "defectors," who were arrested by police the day before yesterday for spying, had in their possession a large number of documents, cameras and films of military targets.

The documents are being examined by the police. Some films that have been developed contain footage of dozens of National Guard camps and posts. Moreover, the "defectors" had in their possession, in hideouts in their homes, maps of Cyprus upon which vital military targets were marked.

According to police sources, the arrested Turkish Cypriots belong to a major and specially trained spy network which, besides providing information to the Turkish Secret Service, also tries to create agitation in the free areas, thus taking advantage of the intensive preelection period. One of them appears to have confessed that the recent explosions in Nicosia and Limassol were the work of the group. Some of the arrested "defectors" have admitted that they were spying.

According to the same police sources, the "defectors" were circulating with rented cars and motorcycles outside National Guard camps and posts in all districts collecting information. Some of them also went three to four times (usually at night) to the occupied areas and returned the same night or the next. Two of those arrested appear to be officers of the Turkish Secret Service. The same sources say this group of spy "defectors" was trained for a long time in Turkey.

Three of them have been living in the free areas for the third straight year, another three for 2 years, and two had recently defected. It has not been ruled out, however, that more arrests will take place shortly. It is pointed out that in addition to an admission of spying, there is also eyewitness testimony. All of them have confessed at great length to the investigating authorities about their activities and actions.

Surveillance began some months ago by a detachment of the Cyprus Information Service in Limassol. The Turkish Cypriots are under continuous and intensive investigation. Among them are Ertokan Ahmet Tataru, Nafis Ertokan Emin, Toker Ismail, Nepcit Saritiklin and others.

More on 'Defectors'

NC121005 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 12 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] According to press reports that have not yet been denied, one of the arrested syp "defectors" has confessed under interrogation that he was spying. He said that at the instructions of the Turkish Cypriot Cypurs Information-Intelligence Service [KIP] he surveilled the recent National Guard "nikiforos 82" exercise and reported on the armaments used in the parade.

The same Turkish Cypriot named eight of his "defector" friends who belong to the same spy group. He also revealed the various sites they were surveilling and the way they passed the information to the occupied territories.

All those arrested have confessed that they reportedly entered the occupied territories without being noticed and that they passed information that dealt with military installations, ports and airports.

DENKTAS COMMENTS ON CURRENCY CHANGE CRITICS

TA101441 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 10 Nov 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriots are free to take every necessary measure to strengthen their economy, and that this has nothing to do with the inter-communal talks. In a statement today, the president rejected the Greek Cypriot allegations that the decision to officially replace the Cyprus pound by the Turkish lira as the currency in the Federate State was in line with Turkey's partitionist policy. Mr Denktas recalled that since 1963, the Turkish Cypriot people had been deprived of their share of the republic's budget, of their monetary rights and of the republic's foreign exchange. He said that the Greek Cypriot allegations were nonsense, and that the measures were something that concerned the internal structure of the Turkish Cypriot community.

The president said that since 1963, the Greek Cypriots had been doing everything possible to deprive the Turkish Cypriots of their rights, and that if the Greek Cypriot administration made a new recourse to the United Nations this would give the Turkish Cypriots another opportunity to remind the United Nations of the realities concerning Cyprus.

Mr Denktas said that it was not the Turkish Cypriot side which withdrew the Cyprus pound from circulation, but it was the Greek Cypriot policy of forcing the Turkish Cypriot to pay foreign exchange in order to obtain Cyprus pounds.

In reply to a question on the arrest of Turkish Cypriots in the south by the Greek Cypriot authorities on the grounds that they spied for the Federated State, Mr Denktas said that since 1963 the Greek Cypriots had been seeing the Turkish Cypriots as rebels or people who deserved to be killed. He said that these arrests proved that there was no change in the feelings of the Greek Cypriots toward the Turkish Cypriot community. He said that this also proved that the Greek Cypriots were unable to give decent shelter to the Turkish Cypriots in the south and that the claim that the Greek Cypriots should govern the Turkish Cypriot community and the entire island was ridiculous and nonsense.

President Denktas was also asked to comment on the decoration of the Austrian foreign minister, Mr Pahr, with the Grand Cross of Makarios -- the third -- by the Greek Cypriot administration. The president said there was nothing about such a decoration in the Cyprus Constitution. It could only be a decoration symbolizing the Greek Cypriot policy and since it was named after Makarios it symbolized Makarios' policy of shedding Turkish Cypriot blood. However, he said, this meant that by accepting the decoration, Mr Pahr approved of what Makarios had done to the Turkish Cypriots for years. Perhaps, the president added, Mr Pahr was not aware of the situation.

AMMAN PAPER INTERVIEWS NORTH'S RAUF DENKTAS

JN040946 Amman JERUSALEM STAR in English 4 Nov 82 p 8

[Excerpts] Origin of the Cyprus Problem

In Cyprus the problem is, and has been, the policy of the Greek Cypriots to make Cyprus a Christian, Greek, Hellenistic island. This has been on their military camps; Christianity, Greece, union with Greece. [sentence as published] And this has been the policy followed by the church for seven years, this is why so many Muslims have died in Cyprus in defence of their soil.

They pretend to be talking with us for a settlment, but they use the time for arming themselves. And after 11 years, on the first of October, they have shown us the rockets -- anti-tank rockets, anti-aircraft rockets, anti-personnel, anti-building rockets, and so on -- which they have built up, and are building, as a threat. And they say, "We have other, more sophisticated weapons which we have not displayed" Well, we know they have. We know they are getting ready, when they find the opportunity, to attack us.

And by making these resolutions at the United Nations and the non-aligned conferences, that there is an invasion in Cyprus -- a false allegation -- by making these resolutions, they are preparing the ground eventually to attack us. But the Islamic world does not consider these things. They don't know what is happening. They vote for them. They deny -- 'well, why should Turkey be there?'

Turkey is here to prevent the wiping out of Islam from Cyprus. Look at it from an international point of view, from a humanitarian point of view. Turkey has come here in order to prevent an out-and-out genocide in Cyprus, worse than the one in Lebanon. And I'm sure if they go and show you the common graves and so on, you will see what mentality they had, and what they could do, and what they would do, had Turkey not come.

But this is triggered [as published] as an invasion by the Greek Cypriots, and it is accepted by most of the Islamic countries as an invasion, and they vote with the Greeks. They don't know that this is a preparation by the Greeks, for what happened in Lebanon to happen here.

So, we are talking. We don't intend to give in. There is either a bizonal federal system, as I agreed with Archbishop Makarios, or there are two countries, two states in Cyprus. This is the future.

The Intercommunal Negotiations

Since the Greek Cypriots are still talking, although there is no major agreement on any issue, although we know that they are using the time for arming themselves and for destroying us, I think we should continue to talk until we really discover that they do not want a federation. So, we have to carry on the talks.

Non-recognition is a difficulty for us, because Greek Cypriots, as "the" government of Cypris, are making the world put an embargo on us. They refuse to land aircraft at our airports.

And we have these difficulties; we can't get enough tourists. We need tourists. This continued difficulty all over the world, Greek Cypriots getting up and talking in international fora as "the" government of Cyprus, we say we want to be heard, and we are told, your government has spoken, so you don't need to be heard.

I think individually, our relations are good -- at the Islamic conference, well we have a hearing, we have friends, who sympathise with us; but we do not have the support which we should have.

We say, if in the Islamic congress the Cyprus problem has been resolved, then that resolution must be carried out wherever the Islamic voice is heard. Every non-aligned conference, every United Nations. [sentence as published]

But we find just the contrary. The Islamic conference has one resolution, and at the non-aligned, a contrary resolution which helps the Greeks. And because the non-aligned decide so, at the United Nations General Assembly we have again votes, Islamic votes which go with the Greeks.

I invite them each time: Send your best men. Send your observers. Send your foreign minsiters. Anyone you wish, incognito if you wish, to see what Cyprus is. Don't have this idea that there is a Greek Cyprus that Mr Kiprianou represents, this whole Cyprus, and there is a little Islamic community which must be protected.

No, in Cyprus, the state of Cyprus is a partnership state, we created it with the Greeks.

Islamic Support

We have some support from a Saudi Arabian religious institute. The rest is very little aid we get, very little -- but economic aid, not social aid.

We have the best touristic area. The Arab world can use this. We want them to come. How can they come? By breaking down the embargo which the Greek Cypriots have put on us. They say that they are "the" government of Cyprus, and therefore no plane should land at our airport in the north.

And governments accept this. No one says to him, 'no you are the Greek sector of a bicommunal government; until you take back the Turks, we are going to treat both sides equally.' No one says this.

And I am sure all countries -- Islamic countries -- if they put their heads together and say 'no, this is an embargo on an Islamic society, and the Greek Cypriots have no right to do this to the Turkish Cypriots, therefore we shall send our planes.' Then this embargo will be broken in two days. And we would have the tourist market, we would have the money, and economic life would be activated enormously.

Why don't they do it? I don't know. We claim it, we ask for it, we plead for it, but they don't take this step.

Short-Term Outlook

There is no hope in the near future. As long as Mr. Kiprianou is the leader on the other side, Mr. Papandreou is the leader in Greece, I see no hope.

I think the Greek Cypriots, one day, will have a look at their guns, their rockets, their ammunition and then they will go mad again. They will think they can afford to attack us, and they will. And I think that is what they are preparing for, and they are not preparing for peace. This is my personal belief.

We must make Greek Cypriots, and the world, understand that this is so, so that they can put pressure on them, to come to their senses, to understand that they can win nothing by war, and to settle the problem on the basis that I agreed with Makarios.

So we need world pressure. But how can I seek world pressure, if I don't get Islamic pressure first?

Plan for Continued Negotiations

We have a set of papers which contain agreed principles, and negotiations are going on around those agreed principles. One side gives its own version on the constitutional aspect, the other side replies; so something is being accumulated. And as this is accumulated there are points of agreement, points of disagreement, points of coincidence or non-coincidence. These shall be looked at again.

But this will not solve the problem. The problem can be solved only if there is the will, the political will on both sides, to solve it. And we see a lack of will on the Greek Cypriot side.

We don't give out details, but it is obvious that both sides have agreed to establish a bizonal federal system. When the Greek Cypriots produce their details of such a setup, we see that they are not really federal. They are trying to create a Greek Cyprus in which they will give certain rights to Turkish Cypriots. We don't want that.

We give our details to them, they look at them they say 'ah, this is not federal, this is confederal.' So, by talking like this, we are continuing.

Now we shall be completing the constitutional aspect entirely. Then time will come for talking geography, and Greek Cypriots have our map in their hands. We now expect them to give us their maps. So this is how it will be.

PAPANDREOU MAKES STATEMENT ON LIMNOS ISSUE

NC102126 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 10 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Our homeland's territorial integrity, national independence and honor are safeguarded. This was stressed to newsmen by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreau, who returned to Athens this afternoon after concluding his 2-day visit to border areas of Evros, Limnos and Lesvos.

Addressing officers in Limnos, Mr Papandreou said: [begin recording] I would like to thank you very much for the extremely comprehensive briefing I was given a short while ago and assure you that I feel particularly moved by our presence here today.

It is true that this visit to the border island of Limnos coincides with a very important, significant I would say, time. As you know, a few days ago, on 5 November to be precise, we were informed by NATO headquarters that Limnos was not to be included in the Apex Express 82 exercise for reasons emanating from above, unspecified reasons, and despite the fact that last July we made it clear that Limnos should be included in the Apex Express 82 exercise. On 5 November, we were informed, following our own initiative, that the document, the message the National Defense Ministry sent in early September, had been lost. It is clear that for agencies such as NATO, it is not reasonable for one to stress that such mistakes and losses are coincidental; the same way we talk about diplomatic illness, here we can talk about a diplomatic loss of course. They also recognize it themselves now because a relevant investigation has been ordered in Naples. [end recording]

Later, speaking to newsmen, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou made the following statement:

[Begin recording] It is really an historic and very interesting and positive coincidence that exactly when the Limnos issue is acquiring international importance and dimensions, we are visiting Limnos and, as you said, this is the first time a prime minister has visited Limnos. I really feel a great national emotion. I am here near the conscripted sons of our people, the armed forces, who are really shouldering on this border island huge responsibilities and a not-so-easy life. However, I am particularly moved by the existing unity, what we call reconciliation between the people and the armed forces, the army; something that everybody (?manifested) on my arrival at Limnos airport. I return to Athens inspired and encouraged, with a feeling of certainty and pride. We will overcome our difficulties; and the territorial integrity, national independence and honor of our homeland will be safeguarded. [end recording]

More on Limnos Statement

[Text] Andreas Papandreou, who ended his tour of military units in border areas yesterday, stated that an imperative prerequisite for the nation's survival is a solid front between people and armed forces. The prime minister added that we must face the threats without concern and fear; and only when we face them united, within the framework of this solid front, can we remain at ease and be able to build the Greece of our visions and expectations, a nationally proud and socially fair Greece.

Speaking to officers in Limnos, Mr Papandreou stressed that we do not accept in any way the old Luns directive on the basis of which the Turkish claims for operational control in the eastern Aegean were incited. In the same manner we could do the same for Izmir, but of course we do not do it. Mr Papandreou added: A reasonable question that will be put forward by the Greek side in Brussels at the next NATO session is, since the alliance presented the limnos issue as a secondary one in the Apex Express-82 exercise, why did it agree to cancel the exercise? We await an answer to this issue that we do not understand.

Mr Papandreou concluded: If the alliance and the Turks based their allegations on the Montreux Treaty, which is definitive on the nationality of the Aegean Islands since 1936, there would be no problem whatsoever.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA Comments

NC101556 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 9 Nov 82 p 1

[Editorial: "Things Have Come to a Head"]

[Text] The Americans and NATO have thrown away their masks and cynically revealed that Turkey's questioning of Greek sovereign rights in the Aegean is also their questioning.

They have revealed their true faces. The Americans and NATO gave in to their double-faced, hypocritical game. They were forced to reveal their anti-Greek feelings. This is why today, as in the past, they are dangerous for our country's territorial integrity.

Turkey is the pampered child even when it is "naughty." The Americans and NATO could not resist the difficulties that the Greek Government has put to them. The issue of Limnos Island became a touchstone which uncovered the worthlessness of NATO statements about the defense and security of the Atlantic alliances' member states.

It proved that the Americans and NATO bless and encourage the Turkish conspiracy against Greece's sovereign rights.

The U.S. and NATO injustices against Greece are abundant. The issue of Limnos Island is neither the first nor will it be the last.

Things have come to a head, the Americans and NATO got the appropriate reply from the Greek Government. The Atlantic alliance cannot be the promoter of unlawful Turkish interests against Greece. Greek national interests cannot be compacted into the anti-Greek measures of NATO or Turkey.

Let the Americans and NATO put this well in their heads. They will not find anti-Greeks in Greece. Let them try to conform and come to their senses if they do not want Greece to shake again with the pan-Hellenic slogans: Out with the Americans. Greece out of NATO.

AKROPOLIS Comments

NC101814 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 10 Nov 82 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "The Pro-Turkish Mr Luns"]

[Text] Mr Luns is rendering very poor service to NATO with his obvious and incomprehensible pro-Turkish attitude. His latest "achievement" was the cancellation of the allied exercise in the Aegean. This was the result of his explicit order to the Naples headquarters that Limnos should not be included in the exercise. Of course, Mr Luns may invoke in his favor the argument that NATO must be neutral in disputes between its members, and that during its exercises areas that could involve it into disputes must be avoided.

In the case under question, however, it is not a matter of a dispute. It is a question of Turkish designs against Greek territory. These designs, which cannot be questioned by anyone, have compelled us to fortify Limnos and the other islands in the eastern Aegean to protect them from Turkish greed. Therefore, Mr Luns is not merely neutral when he considers Limnos as a disputable area and excludes it from the allied exercises. He supports Ankara's policy, which actually pursues the disarmament of our islands and disputes their Greek status.

However, support for the Turkish policy means preparation of new hardships for the alliance; it means the rendering of services to Moscow, which also supports Ankara just because Moscow aims, through Ankara, at the complete dismemberment of NATO's southeastern flank. However, even if we ignored all this, on the basis of what logic should we pay the price for maintaining cohesion within the alliance's eastern flank? Doesn't Turkey, which is, moreover, the one who created and maintains the Aegean crisis, have any such obligation?

RIZOSPASTIS REVIEWS U.S. BASES NEGOTIATIONS

[Text] The first phase of the Greek-U.S. negotiations on the bases in expected to conclude by Monday when U.S. negotiator Reginald Bartholomew will leave for the United States to receive "further" instructions. He will be preceded by U.S. Ambassador in Athens M. Stearns, who has already left to convey a view of the negotiations to Washington. Mr Stearns also wanted to give his visit the character of a "protest" and pressure against the [government's] decision to permit the Polytechnic march up to the U.S. Embassy, a question for which he has already made a representation.

According to press reports, the subject of discussions thus far has been the timetable for the bases to remain in our country. According to the same reports, the Greek side proposes a 5-year stay for the bases with a 3-year extension if at the end of the 5-year period the agreement is abrogated, and with the right (after these 8 years) for renegotiations. On their part, the U.S. side is said to insist on an approximately twice as long period as the minimum time limit for the bases to remain in our country, while it appears as yielding to the concessions demanded by the Greek Government.

In any case, the negotiations -- which continued yesterday afternoon with a new Kapsis-Bartholomew meeting -- continue to held in strict secrecy, and the government continues to maintain that this secrecy serves the national interest.

FOREIGN MINISTER ADDRESSES COUNCIL OF EUROPE

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that with the approval of the new Constitution through a referendum, Turkey has entered the last stage of the process leading to the establishment of a parliamentary democracy. Addressing the meeting of the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee in Strasbourg, France, Turkmen discussed the referendum and the relations between Turkey and the Council of Europe. He said that now that the Constitution has been ratified, general elections would be held in the fall of 1983 or, at the latest, in the spring of 1984, unless of course something unexpected happened.

Turkmen pointed out that most international press reports on the content of the new Turkish Constitution were based on wrong information, adding: It is very regrettable for us to see that those who think that only they have democratic morals resort to the entirely antidemocratic method of distorted reporting.

Turkmen recalled that the content of the constitutions of the Council of Europe members were not all the same. After giving a few examples, he added: Every constitution inevitably reflects the particular nation's experiences and traditions, and aims at meeting that nation's needs and fitting its characteristics. The important thing is for a constitution to be able to truly reflect the universal principles of democracy and, when necessary, for the people to be able to change it.

The foreign minister stressed that the inspiration for the new Constitution had come from the Council of Europe principles, the Universal Human Rights Declaration and the European human rights agreement. Noting that the Turkish people had voted for the Constitution realizing that the country had returned from the brink of a civil war, Turkmen said: The Turkish people sincerely want the reestablishment of a multiparty parliamentarian democracy. However, they do not want the process of returning to democracy to lead them to a disaster once again. The Turkish people have realized the democratic principles and the necessity for certain stipulations in the new Constitution. They participated in the referendum en masse in an exemplary atmosphere of freedom and calm -- as could be observed by everyone -- ratifying our Constitution and confirming their full confidence in the president.

On the relations between Turkey and the Council of Europe, Turkmen said that, with prejudice and ill will, certain circles in Europe would never give up trying to harm the relations between Turkey and its European associates. He added: The important thing for the Council of Europe is that its members, with a sense of responsibility, have at last been able to ensure that, from now on, the relations between Turkey and the Council of Europe are based on mutual understanding and trust. These countries can contribute to the process of returning to a democracy in Turkey and strengthening the concept of democracy -- the basic principle of the Council of Europe -- only in this way.

The meeting of the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee will end with a joint communique to be issued tonight.

PRIME MINISTER ULUSU SPEAKS ON ECONOMY, LABOR

[Statement by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at a meeting with private sector representatives in Ankara on 11 November 1982 -- recorded]

[Text] As I have said on other occasions, the economic program we are now implementing has two main goals; one is to prevent inflation, and the other to establish a sound balance of payments.

Inflation is the source of all economic problems. The entire system of values is disruped in a community where prices change from one day to the next. Social justice and economic peace can be ensured only when the rate of inflation is reduced to a minimum. A high rate of inflation is undesirable for all sections of the community. Consequently, our fight against inflation continues uninterruptedly. The inflation rate was more than 100 percent and we reduced it to 37 percent in 1981. We expect this rate to fall to a lower level in 1982.

The wholesale index during the 12-month period from the end of September 1981 to the end of September 1982 has been 23.5 percent. Our target for 1983 is to reduce the inflation rate to 20 percent. As you can see, our target rate calls for an uninterrupted struggle, efforts and sacrifices during the coming year as well. We must not relax now because of our achievements in this field, because the fight against inflation calls for great attentention and care. A few wrong steps might take us back to our starting point. Our government will continue to be very careful regarding this matter. Therefore, we are determined to pursue our money and credit policy in a balanced way and in parallel with the increasing services and production. We will continue to pursue a policy of a balanced budget. We prepared the 1983 draft budget with that objective in mind. The policy of balanced wages and revenues we have pursued so far will be continued. We will be careful to consider the country's general economic balance and to make decisions that do not harm this balance when determining civil servants' salaries, workers' wages, farmers' floor prices, and the volume and interest rates of loans being used by the traders and industrialists.

The second main goal of our economic program is to establish a sound balance of payments. This is a centuries-old problem that we have not been able to solve since the days of the Ottoman Empire. We need a sound balance of foreign exchange in order for our economy to function, grow and develop through the addition of new resources to our existing ones. This problem can be resolved once and for all if our economy opens to the outside world; and the key in this field is exports, because we cannot continuously depend on private foreign loans. Neither is it possible to claim that the economy can grow based on artificial supports. In fact, such supports have a very high price.

Therefore, we attach special importance to increasing our country's potential for gaining foreign exchange. Significant progress has been achieved toward establishing a sound balance of payments, thanks to the measures we have taken. Our foreign exchange needs are being increasingly met by our own resources. The ratio of the foreign exchange gained from exports and remittances from our workers abroad to our imports is rising steadily. A few years ago, this rate was around 70 percent while this year we expect it to rise to 95 percent. I would like to especially point out that the current foreign exchange deficit, which was greater than $3 billion in the recent past, will drop to below $500 million in 1983.

The development of our exports continues; at the end of September our exports total $3.816 billion. The Turkish entrepreneurs have a great share in this development and success.

At this point, I would like to briefly discuss our relations with the EEC. As you know, our relations with the EEC are passing through quite a negative stage. Under the pretext of its own economic difficulties, the Community has imposed certain limitations on our textile and clothing exports. Consequently, one of our very important and rapidly developing industrial sectors is facing great difficulties. Naturally, our government, together with the concerned sector, has taken the necessary measures. Unfortunately as you know, a positive result has not yet been achieved. Therefore, our government has concluded that it has become inevitable to take certain measures in order to improve our trade balance with the EEC -- a trade balance that has a deficit of more than $1 billion. Since we are not allowed to sell more goods, we have no choice but to buy less from those countries. At the same time, it has also become increasingly important to protect our industrial sectors which produce some of the goods we import from the EEC.

Taking this opportunity, I would like to tell you about some of the economic tasks we are trying to do in the coming period. We will conclude the reorganization work we have insistently carried out in order to restore a speedy, efficient and fruitful mechanism to the state organization, to make it produce work and not paperwork, and finally to make it encourage a growing economy and fall in step with the dynamism of development. We will review and reform those structures of the public economic enterprises -- which we view as the bleeding wounds of our economy -- and of the agricultural sales and credit cooperative which cause them to waste resources.

Another important issue in this period will be to make the necessary arrangements to base worker-employer relations on a sound basis within the framework outlined by our new Constitution. A just and lasting labor order will be set up which does not create conflicts between or discriminate against these two main elements of our economic life -- two elements, which, like skin and bones, are inseparable. The economic success of the coming period depends on that.

In fact, our new Constitution has brought new targets and outlined a sound framework regarding this issue. What we have to do is to use this framework, our past experiences and future requisites together in the best possible way and to set up that system which will enable our workers and employers to contribute to our economic development together and with enthusiasm.

MILLIYET ON EVREN VISIT TO PRC, OTHER COUNTRIES

NC120953 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 8 Nov 82 p 7

[Umit Gurtuna report from Ankara]

[Text] Head of State Kenan Evren's visit to five countries in the Far East will begin on Sunday, 12 December. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, on the other hand, will be visiting Moscow on 29 November.

Head of State Kenan Evren will first go to the People's Republic of China on 12 December where he will spend 3 days. In the political part of the official talks, the two sides will dwell on the pro-NATO policy which China has been pursuing in recent years. They are also expected to dwell on certain military issues. Ways and means of increasing the volume of trade between China and Turkey will also be explored.

The next country to be visited by General Evren is Indonesia. Turkey and Indonesia have maintained close friendly relations for years. Therefore, political talks will be carried out within certain general lines.

South Korea will be the third country General Evren will visit. Political talks in South Korea, where General Evren was a lieutenant general during the Korean war, will take place within the framework of traditional friendly relations. The most lively economic talks in the Far East are expected to take place in South Korea.

General Evren will then proceed to Bangladesh. In the official talks there, the question of providing needed goods to Bangladesh against Islamic Bank funds will be discussed. On his way back to Turkey, General Evren will pay a 1-day special visit to Pakistan. He will specifically call on Pakistani head of state Ziaul Haq and will probably return home on 27 December.

It has been learned that Foreign Minister Turkmen, who was expected to pay an official visit to Moscow in the middle of last summer, will make this visit on 29 November. The date of this visit, which has been put off several times for various reasons, has been fixed after Ankara decided: "Relations between the two countries are now conducive for this visit."

JOURNALIST, EDITOR FACE PRISON SENTENCES

[Text] Istanbul, 8 Nov, (AA) — One military prosecutor in Istanbul has initiated a lawsuit against columnist Oktay Akbal and managing editor Oktay Gonensin of the Istanbul daily "CUMHURIYET."

The indictment charges the journalists with violating Edict No 70 of the National Security Council redrawing the limits of political comment in a column by Akbal during October 1982. The prosecutor is demanding prison terms ranging from 3 to 12 months for the offense. The prosecutor has decided to drop charges against the same two journalists in connection with the article Akbal wrote on 16 November 1981 last year.

GUNAYDIN ON ANKARA'S POLICY TOWARD CYPRUS

NC051055 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 2 Nov 82 p 3

[Letter from Cyprus by Resat Akar: "Adverse Effects in Our Foreign Policy"]

[Text] Whenever the Greek Cypriot administration makes representations against the Turkish Cypriot community, it persistently argues that "the northern part of the island is under Turkey's occupation," trying to prove that no such thing as a Turkish Federated State of Cyprus exists.

Through such efforts, the Greek Cypriot leadership manages to exploit even the slightest shortcomings of the Turkish side and thus to influence world opinion. The Turkish side on the other hand keeps reiterating that "Turkey carried out the peace operation for the purpose of protecting the rights and interests of the Turkish Cypriot community on the island. Today this community has established its own administration and proclaimed this to the world." This is a persistent effort to belie the Greek Cypriot propaganda.

But the fact remains that so far the Greek Cypriot efforts have been supported and the Greek Cypriot leaders are accepted as "the leaders of the "Cyprus Republic." The reasons for this are that the propaganda activities of the Greek Cypriot leadership are conducted by experts trained at great cost, and that the Turkish Cypriot leadership and occasionally the Turkish Foreign Ministry make inconsistent remarks or wrong moves which provide the Greek Cypriots and the world with trump cards that can be exploited.

We can cite the Congress of the National Unity Party (NUP) which has been in power for 6 years, and the developments which took place a short time ago as a proof of our argument. The Turkish ambassador in Nicosia told the two NUP members in Nicosia that "the fatherland does not want you to oppose Cagatay at this stage. There is a message to this effect from Ankara." The ambassador added that this message could be announced to the public. There is no doubt at all that this attitude will have a new and adverse effect on Turkish foreign policy.

It can be seen that the Greek Cypriot side will tell the whole world that Dr Dervies Eroglue and Hakki Atun, both members of the legislative assembly, admitted "we have conferred with the ambassador of our fatherland and we were told that at this stage they want Cagatay to continue in office." The Greek Cypriots will turn to the world and say: "You see, the administration of [north] Cyprus is in the hands of Ankara."

If the Turkish Foreign Ministry were to attach greater importance to such sensitive and serious matters, it would be able to prevent the false and wrong Greek Cypriot propaganda from gaining a foothold.

President Sends Condolences

[Unattributed report: "President Sends Condolences on Brezhnev's Death"]

[Text] President Dr Rudolf Kirchschlaeger has conveyed condolences by telegram to the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet on the death of Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. In this telegram, the president underscores, among other things, that the report of the death of Leonid Brezhnev has also deeply moved the Austrian people. By virtue of his unusual personality and his wish for cooperation and peace, which he expressed again and again, Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, decisively influenced the destiny of the world. He also always paid benevolent attention to Soviet-Austrian relations and thus decisively contributed to the high quality of the Austrian-Soviet relationship. The human grandeur of Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, his circumspection and complete dedication to his great and responsible task will have far-reaching repercussions in history.

EXPORTS TO SOVIET UNION CONTINUE INCREASE

AU121655 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 12 Nov 82 p 16

[Editorial article: "Boom of Exports to USSR Continues"]

[Text] Vienna -- The above-average increase in Austrian exports to the Soviet Union in 1981 is continuing this year. It was possible in the first 8 months of 1982 to boost exports by 25.6 percent to an overall amount of 6.3 billion schillings whereas imports dropped 18.6 percent to 11.6 billion schillings. In view of this development, Austrian Trade delegate in Moscow Drascczyk regards a substantial reduction in last year's records trade deficit of 23 billion schillings to some 9 or 10 billion schillings as possible. The increase in exports is mainly due to the success in the building of plants, machinery and ships (an increase of 186 percent) but also in the consumer goods sector (an increase of 22 percent) and in the export of foodstuffs (a 160-percent increase). Austrian machine and shipbuilding industries now have orders from the Soviet Union which total some 14 billion schillings through 1984-85. Actions of the Federal Chamber of Commerce in the USSR in the past few years have been a major factor in the success of exports.

CSSR PRESIDENT HUSAK'S VISIT MAY BE POSTPONED

[Editorial Report: "On the Eve of Deferment of Husak's Visit to Austria"]

[Text] Vienna/Prague -- The visit to Austria of Czechoslovak state-party head Gustav Husak, scheduled for next Thursday, will likely have to be deferred. Even though no official confirmation to this effect from Prague has yet been received, the visit, which has already been postponed twice, now seems to be falling victim to the death of CPSU Central Committee Secretary General Brezhnev. It is regarded as certain that Husak will depart for Moscow on Monday to attend the funeral ceremonies for Brezhnev.

It was reported from the president's office after the announcement of Brezhnev's death that in connection with the forthcoming state visit, "everything is now open." Most recently the Husak visit, from which both sides expect new incentives in bilateral relations, was called off because of the Hodic espionage affair.

CABINET APPROVES NUCLEAR PLANT ACCORD WITH CSSR

[Unattributed report on Austrian cabinet session on 9 November 1982: "Agreement With CSSR on Nuclear Plants"]

[Excerpt] The cabinet has approved the agreement between the Republic of Austria and the CSSR on the regulations of problems of common interest connected with nuclear plants and has decided to propose to the president that he authorize the minister of foreign affairs to sign the agreement.

The agreement, in essence, envisages three levels of information: -- a general exchange of information at periodical talks between experts about nuclear power programs and pertinent legal provisions which will take place at least every 2 years; -- a specific exchange of information before the commissioning or during the operation of a nuclear powerplant close to the border: the securing of evidence and data concerning the environment at least once a year on the average, and immediately in case of significant changes; and -- notification in case of an unforeseen event from which hazards to the border population cannot be excluded with certainty. This notification is not contingent upon the distance of such a site from the border and must take place immediately by way of the agreed-upon contact channels at the same time measures for the protection of the pertinent state's own population are initiated.

CHANCELLOR KOHL PREVIEWS UPCOMING U.S. VISIT

[Text] Bonn, 13 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl attaches special significance to his meeting with U.S. President Ronald Reagan. On the eve of his 3-day visit to the United States, where he will be received at the White House on Monday as the first Western statesman to visit since Leonid Brezhnev's death, Kohl told DPA that he is certain the meeting in Washington will be a demonstration of German-American friendship.

Kohl wants to have a thorough exchange of opinions of all important international issues. "I regard my visit to Washington as the beginning of particularly intensive, partnerlike and equal German-American cooperation." He regards it as particularly important to make the population of both countries more aware of their common interests. The United States and the Federal Republic are linked by the same ideals and the same political goals.

Kohl pointed out that next year the 300th anniversary of the first German immigrants to the United States will be celebrated. Both this and the meeting 30 years ago between the first federal chancellor, Konrad Adenauer, and the American president underlined the historic links between the FRG and the United States.

Within the framework of his official working visit, Kohl will conduct talks at the White House and with Secretary of State George Shultz, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and trade union representatives. A meeting with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar and representatives of Jewish organizations is planned for Tuesday in New York.

Kohl Interview on Visit

[Interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Kleinman; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Is the lifting of sanctions by the U.S. Government against deliveries for the Soviet pipeline a gift given to welcome you?

[Answer] I certainly wouldn't put it that way. Negotiations on this important matter have been going on for many weeks between the Europeans and the Americans. This is part of the talks as a whole, and it certainly is the U.S. President's desire to hold these talks in the best possible climate. In the past few days and hours I have received many signals in this direction.

[Question] What do you expect from this first personal meeting with the U.S. President, especially now when there is a change of leadership in Moscow?

[Answer] You've mentioned the key aspect. Naturally, this is an unusually important time politically. The change of leadership in Moscow, General Secretary Brezhnev's death and the election of a new general secretary add many new problems to the existing issues in the East-West relationship. This will, of course, be at the forefront of our talks. However, we will also talk about the existing problems which must be discussed between the Europeans and the United States, including German-American relations.

During this first official visit to Washington FRG chancellor, it is my goal to contribute to improving these relations as much as possible and to ensure they remain as good as possible. There are problems on both sides, and I repeat, we must talk more with each other and less about each other. I am quite certain the American President also will express a similar desire.

STATEMENT HAILS END TO GAS PIPELINE EMBARGO

[Text] Bonn, 1e Nov (DPA) -- In a Federal Government statement, Government Spokesman Diether Stolze describes the lifting of the gas pipeline embargo as proof of successful efforts by all concerned for an improved coordination of policies of Western states.

The statement, published on Saturday evening, also notes that the Federal Government regards the lifting of the embargo as a signal to the Soviet Union for the development of constructive East-West relations.

USSR Concessions Necessary

LD142036 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 14 Nov 82

[Text] The minister of state at the Foreign Ministry, Mertes (CDU), has said that an increase in trade between East and West depends on political concessions by the Soviet Union. At the same time he called the end to the disagreement between Europe and America regarding the natural gas pipeline and the agreement by the West on a common economic strategy, positive results of broad significance. Speaking to DEUTSCHER DEPECHEN DIENST, Mertes called in particular on former Chancellor Schmidt to give full support to this agreement within the alliance at both national and Atlantic levels.

NO GENSCHER U.S. VISIT; WILL MEET WITH SHULTZ

[Excerpt] Washington, 14 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign MInister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will not take part in the visit by Chancellor Helmut Kohl to Washington due to a lack of time, Diether Stolze, federal government spokesman, announced in the U.S. capital on Sunday evening.

Genscher is presently in Moscow to attend the obsequies for the late Soviet state and party chief, Leonid Brezhnev. Originally he had intended to go to Washington on Monday. Stolze said that Genscher will leave Moscow by air with Secretary of State George Schultz and will take this opportunity to hold political talks with him. However, during a stopover he will change planes and return to Bonn.

Stolze said that Chancellor Helmut Kohl and President Ronald Reagan exchanged letters during the night from Saturday to Sunday on the East-West situation following the change of leadership in the Kremlin and on the lifting of the U.S. embargo against the European-Soviet gas pipeline deal. Stolze gave no details but emphasized that Kohl fully agrees with the lifting of the U.S. embargo. France's attitude in this question is not considered a "serious problem" by the chancellor.

In the 1-hour talk Genscher referred to the continuity of policy toward Poland following the change of government in Bonn. Czyrek elucidated, it was said, Warsaw's latest decision.

ADN Reports Talks

LD141816 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1745 GMT 14 Nov 82

[Text] Moscow, 14 Nov (ADN) -- In Moscow this evening, Erich Honecker, general secretary of the SED Central Committee and chairman of the GDR State Council, met with FRG Federal President Karl Carstens, and Deputy Federal Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher for an exchange of views. They discussed current international problems, particularly problems relating to safe-guarding peace, arms limitation and disarmament as well as the further development of relations between both German states.

Both sides noted that, in view of the international situation, everything must be done to strengthen peace. The two German states which are in the center of Europe bear a special responsibility, Erich Honecker and Karl Carstens stressed. They declared the intention of their states to continue to develop their relations in line with the basic treaty.

State Secretary Frank-Joachim Herrmann, head of chancellory of the chairman of the GDR Council of States; Egon Winkelmann, the GDR ambassador extraordinary plenipotentiary to the USSR, and the head of the federal president's office, state secretary Hans Neusel, took part in the talk.

DPA on Talks

[Text] Moscow, 14 Nov (DPA) -- Federal President Karl Carstens and Chairman of the GDR State Council Erich Honecker, who are taking part in Brezhnev's funeral, met for an hour on Sunday. Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher also took part in the meeting, which was held in a guest house on the Lenin Hills where Carstens is staying. A joint communique on the talks is being prepared for later this evening.

At the start of the talks, Carstens said, in the presence of journalists, that it was a sad occasion that had brought him and Honecker together, but that he was glad to have the meeting. Honecker agreed with the president.

Carstens last met with Honecker at the funeral of the late Yugoslav President Josip Broz Tito in Belgrade.

Replying to a question by journalists as to whether a visit to the FRG by Honecker had been discussed, Carstens said this evening after the discussion that the GDR State Council chairman had not yet agreed to a meeting. Before the fall of the social-liberal government in October, a Honecker visit this year was being contemplated.

From the Bonn side, Secretary of State at the Federal President's Office Hans Neusel, and from the East Berlin side, the head of Chancery of the State Council, Chairman Frank-Joachim Herrmann; and GDR ambassador in Moscow Egon Winkelmann, also took part in the talks.

[Hamburg DPA in German at 1950 GMT on 14 Nov reports that Honecker apparently did not indicate whether and when he proposes to visit the Federal Republic. Carstens is understood to have reiterated that the invitation extended by Helmut Schmidt still stands under the government of Helmut Kohl.

["The atmosphere of the talk is understood to have been very open and businesslike. Bonn sees the meeting, 1 month after the change of government, as a sign of continuity in its relations with the GDR. Honecker is said to have paid tribute to the relevant passages in Federal Chancellor Kohl's policy statement. Apparently he did not repeat the critical comments made in East Berlin on the policy statement.

["Carstens is believed to have referred to the importance of visits and travel for reciprocal relations.

[It was learned that both Carstens and Honecker, when discussing the CSCE review conference in Madrid, expressed interest in the holding of a European conference on confidence-building measures and disarmament. Both expressed their vital interest in a positive result to the Soviet-American negotiations in Geneva on intermediate-range weapons in Europe."]

GENSCHER, EC MINISTERS DISCUSS TRADE IN MOSCOW

[Text] Moscow, 15 Nov (DPA) -- The European Community has reached an agreement on the contents of a Western arrangement concerning the future shaping of economic relations with the East. This became clear, according to Juergen Sudhoff, deputy spokesman of the Federal Government, on Monday morning during a meeting between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his colleagues from four other EC countries at the residence of the German ambassador in Moscow. The talk was attended by the British, Italian and Danish foreign ministers, as well as by French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson.

Last night at a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz, Genscher welcomed the lifting of the U.S. sanctions against the gas pipeline deal. According to Sudhoff, the two sides agreed that trade represents a stabilizing element in East-West relations and that there is no intention of waging a trade war.

U.S. President Ronald Reagan justified the lifting of sanctions by saying that an agreement with the Western European allies on a future restrictive attitude toward technology exports and toward granting credits to the Soviet Union has been achieved. Paris has rejected this reasoning.

GENSCHER ON POST-BREZHNEV EAST-WEST RELATIONS

[Text] Bonn, 13 Nov (DPA) -- In the view of FDP Chairman and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the West, by the consistent continuation of its foreign and security policy course, should contribute to the prevention of problems in East-West relations arising from the changeover in the Soviet Union.

Genscher said Saturday on Deutschlandfunk that the West is relying on what the new Soviet leadership has said: That the basic lines of present foreign policy will be followed. Thus, it is important that both Bonn and Washington have stated that the West is interested in developing cooperation with the Soviet Union and its partners.

Barzel Views Implications

[Text] Luebeck, 13 Nov (DPA) -- The minister of inner-German affairs, Rainer Barzel, thinks that with the death of Brezhnev and the election of Yuriy Andropov as the new party leader, a "stiffer breeze and a harsher tone" will initially predominate in Moscow. At a lecture in Luebeck on Friday evening, Barzel said that the events in the Soviet Union possibly signify a "decisive turning-point" in its policy towards the West. A time of "imponderables and of uncertainty" is coming.

Irrespective of this, in the view of Barzel, people in the FRG can look with confidence to the future and trust "in our own strength." We should not expect too much of those in power in the GDR at present in view of the events in the Soviet Union, the minister said.

Mertes on Soviet Policy

[Text] Osnabrueck, 13 Nov (DPA) -- The election of Yuriy Andropov as the new general secretary of the CPSU means, in the view of Alois Mertes, minister of state in the Foreign Office, that Soviet politics in the next few years will be characterized "by continuity, authority and a high degree of clarity of long-term aims." In an interview with the NEUE OZOSNABRUCKER ZEITUNG (Saturday edition), the minister said that Andropov stands for these three factors in Moscow politics. His life work predestined him, by Soviet standards, to a leadership role.

Mertes see the surprisingly swift decision of the succession as proof of the Soviet leadership's capacity to act. This reaction also has a foreign policy aspect. Above all, however, it serves as a "demonstration of continuity" for those in the country. The Soviet negotiating positions in Geneva and in the CSCE followup meeting, as in Brezhnev's time, will be formulated through collective decisions. This guarantees that arbitrary and personal views will not determine Moscow's policy.

Mertes stressed that the FRG in close contact with its allies, will strive to conduct an "honest dialogue" with the new Soviet leadership. In spite of the serious opposition and tension, what matters is to work out spheres of common interest "without anticommunist demagogy." Relations with the Soviet Union play "a decisive role in the preser ation of peace with human rights." This also includes "genuinely balanced and verifiable disarmament."

The newspaper made an edited version of this interview available to DPA in advance.

Press on Death, Consequences

DW121109 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 12 Nov 82

[From The Press Review]

[Text] Newspaper commentators deal extensively today with various aspects of Soviet policy before and after the death of party and state chief Leonid Brezhnev.

The HESSISCH-NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE notes: It was Brezhnev's principle to hold the Soviet empire together. He achieved this by using modern and crude methods, compromise and force and detente and threat -- all at the same time. No successor can afford not to measure up to him in this respect. Although the doses can be altered, probably to the advantage of tougher external action to gain inner strength. This doesn't mean, however, that we must fear dramatic ups and downs in Soviet policy. However, there certainly will be some hardening in the medium term.

The paper DIE WELT points out: As a successors to Lenin and Stalin, Brezhnev was a suppressor of the great Russian people. That was not all, however. Thanks to a doctrine which bears his name, the freedom movements in Czechoslovakia were quelled; he gave the order for the bloody struggle to subjugate the people in Afghanistan; and he is responsible for the elimination of the Solidarity trade union in Poland. There are some people in the West who are tampering with history and want to make Brezhnev a symbol of detente. In fact, however, he used the policy of detente to further increase the Soviet Union's military superiority in Europe.

The SUDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG stresses: It is certainly true that Brezhnev, the Soviet leadership and the Soviet people didn't and don't want war any more than American presidents or West German chancellors, parties and citizens. However, this never kept Brezhnev from applying force wherever it was possible without the danger of unleashing an international conflagration. It didn't keep him from arming the Soviet Union in a way that enables it to wage any kind of war and win any kind of victory. What is more, Moscow's foreign policy demonstrated during Brezhnev's time that it was able to pursue a policy of expansion, ideological aggression, intimidation and threats which allowed it to come close to its aims without war and without being threatened itself.

The BERLINER MORGENPOST notes: The Germans have no reason to fashion wreaths expressing gratitude for Leonid Brezhnev. He succeeded in introducing Soviet policy toward the West into the Ostpolitik of Social Democratic federal governments. He was able to fix the partition of Germany and its capital, Berlin, in the treaties with the East. Brezhnev practiced Stalin's mass terrorism with refined means. He stepped up aggressive armament at the expense of the Soviet national economy. He mercilessly put down the Prague spring, militarily subjugated helpless Afghanistan and turned off the lights in Poland. It should be left up to the Kremlin soothsayers to find a successor for Brezhnev, but dramatic corrections in Moscow's policy can hardly be expected.

The FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE commentator states: During the time of Brezhnev, the Soviet Union's policy was determined by the Politburo. But even if it wanted to -- and there are no indications of this -- the Politburo is unable to suddenly change course. The Soviet Union is perseveringly pursuing imperialism through the means of high armament, intimidation and consolidation of the territory under its rule by force. This establishes the framework and the aims of domestic and foreign policies. This course has a chain of causes and effects, and follows its own laws. It is not reasonable to expect great changes in Moscow's policy after Brezhnev's death. The best that the West can hope for is that the Soviet Union after Brezhnev's death will continue for a long time as it was under his rule.

The NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG writes: The mourning music on Radio Moscow is followed by the assurances that the Kremlin will continue Brezhnev's policy, even though the speculations of the Kremlin watchers have already begun. The world will hear about struggles for power behind the Kremlin walls although the men of the Politburo make their decisions by themselves. The Red superpower stands by its tradition of not allowing strangers into the citadel. Without running any risks, we can predict that the old men who surrounded Brezhnev will back his domestic and foreign policy course for the time being.

The MUNCHNER MERKUR points out: Some Western politicians may now be hoping for new leaders who have been less influenced than Brezhnev by Stalinism. So far, however, there are no indications that any of the potential successors would follow a more flexible policy toward the West. It seems more realistic to fear that the relatively humane Brezhnev could be replaced by a person or collective who want to impress their enemies with saber rattling. However, even this would be no reason to predict the end of the world. The Soviet leadership groups of past decades were not naive revolutionaries, but realists who respect the determination and strength of others. We can certainly hope that this won't suddenly change.

The ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz asks: Will the future composition of the power center on the Moskva River be described as a Soviet Jaruzelski collective? Will the Polish example be followed with regard to the strong cooperation among the Army, the secret police and the party with a simultaneous reduction in status of the state apparatus? Viewed in this way, the surprising appointment on 25 May of 69-year-old state security chief Yuriy Andropov as CPSU Central Committee secretary could be considered to be a preliminary decision.

The HANNOVERSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG recalls: Whoever receives Brezhnev's inheritance, will find that this burden is not suited for rapid power policy action. The responsibilities of this job will dampen any enthusiasm. The task waiting for Brezhnev's successors seems almost insoluble because they must eventually strive for new shores. However, they are situated in a vehicle which threatens to collapse under its own weight.

KOHL HAS MEETING WITH CANADA'S PIERRE TRUDEAU

[Text] Bonn, 12 Nov (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Kohl received the Canadian prime minister, Pierre Trudeau on Friday in Bonn. The unofficial visit, made during a trip Trudeau is making to Europe, is the first contact between the two following the change of government. The agenda included the East-West situation, particularly following Yuriy Andropov's appointment as Brezhnev's successor, and the world economic situation.

Kohl gave a luncheon after the meeting.

Trudeau will meet Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the afternoon.

Further Reports on Visit

[Excerpts] Bonn, 12 Nov (DPA) -- At his meeting in Bonn on Friday with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, Chancellor Helmut Kohl has stressed the "all-around good relations" between the two countries. Kohl had invited Trudeau, who is currently on a European trip, for a working talk. At a luncheon in the chancellor's office, the CDU chairman stressed close cooperation between the FRG and Canada on an international level. Economic cooperation, which has to be developed, was stressed as particularly important.

Late in the afternoon, Trudeau met with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. In the evening, a meeting was planned with his friend, former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, at the Canadian ambassador's residence in Bonn.

Alliance, Security Discussed

[Text] Bonn, 12 Nov (DPA) -- A government spokesman said that at the center of the 2-hour exchange of views between Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau was the common alliance and security policy. Kohl stressed the desire for consolidating NATO's political and intelligence bases. The chancellor explained in detail the German policy with regard to the arms control negotiations on medium-range missiles, which aims at achieving the Western negotiating objective of a mutual zero-solution.

At a subsequent meeting between Trudeau and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the two sides said that the Soviet leadership statement on the continuation of the current fundamental political lines is important. According to the Foreign Ministry, Genscher emphasized the importance of a reliable and predictable Western policy, especially at the present time.

GENSCHER SUPPORTS STAYING WITH DUAL DECISION

[Text] Hamburg, 13 Nov (DPA) -- Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has spoken out in favor of staying with the NATO dual decision on the deployment of American medium-range missiles in Europe if the Geneva disarmament negotiations do not bring results before autumn of 1983. In an interview with the Hamburg magazine, DER SPIEGEL, Genscher said: "We want a bilateral renunciation of medium-range missiles. If, however, we do not achieve that by the autumn, or if we do not achieve it totally, then I will resist with all my strength a breaking off of the negotiations."

Genscher said he is astounded over the criticism expressed by the SPD's disarmament expert, Egon Bahr, of similar remarks made by Defense Minister Woerner.

"I must put the question to the SPD whether, in the event that the negotiations do not achieve the goal we desire, it wants the negotiations to be broken off." Further negotiations without deployment of the missiles, however, means a deviation from past government policy, "and that is a deviation from the 12 points of Helmut Schmidt." "If the SPD runs away now, then it is endangering success in the negotiations."

BARZEL COMMENTS ON 'SPECIAL RELATIONS' WITH GDR

[Text] Bonn, 11 Nov (DPA) -- The federal minister for Inner-German relations, Rainer Barzel (CDU), in a statement of principle on the new government's policy on Germany, has underlined the goal of German unity, the validity of intra-German agreements and the "special relations" with the GDR. In his first address to the Bundestag committee for intra-German relations today, the minister said: "As far as policy on Germany is concerned, continuity means reaffirmation of the preamble in the Basic Law which calls on the entire German people to bring about its unity in peace."

Continuity also means, Barzel said, adhering "to the contractually established modus vivendi" which established that there exists at present two states on German soil. It goes without saying that these are two independent, separate states, since it has not been possible to establish them under a common roof. But because "this Germany, shattered in the war" which still has no peace treaty, still exists, "the relations we have with the GDR, as the other German state, are for this reason not the usual international relations, but are special relations."

Jenninger To Visit East Berlin

[Text] Hamburg, 13 Nov (DPA) -- Philipp Jenninger, minister of state in the chancellor's office, said in the newspaper BERLINER MORGENPOST (Sunday edition) that it is in the interests of Bonn and East Berlin to continue the bilateral dialogue.

"I assume," said Jenninger, "that the leadership of the GDR sees things in exactly the same way. What we want to do is achieve practical results that serve the interests of the people and peace in Europe."

The CDU politician announced that he shortly will be going to East Berlin "to speak with high-ranking representatives of the GDR leadership." The invitation to SED leader Erich Honecker to visit the FRG stands.

Schneider Discusses GDR Visit

[Text] Bonn, 13 Nov (DPA) -- Regional Planning, Housing and Urban Development Minister Oscar Schneider, who this Sunday will be the first member of the new Federal Government to pay an official visit to the GDR, has stressed the determination of the CDU/FDP coalition to continue the dialogue with East Berlin. It had always been a mistaken assumption that a CDU/CSU-led government would not seek intra-German dialogue, Schneider said on Saturday in an interview on the Sender Freies Berlin radio station. On the contrary, dialogue with the GDR is an essential part of the policy of the new government.

Schneider, who will open a Federal German architecture exhibition with his GDR counterpart, Wolfgang Junker, in Magdeburg on Monday, stressed that he has no instructions from the chancellor to sound people out on anything. During his trip, which is related to his particular ministerial responsibilities, he will gladly talk to "as many of my German countrymen as possible." He is sure that the specialist talks between the housing construction departments in the FRG and the GDR will continue in the future.

Braeutigam on Exchange Issue

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 15 Nov (DPA) -- Otto Braeutigam, head of the FRG's permanent mission in East Berlin, considers that at present, the question of the compulsory minimum exchange amount is the decisive issue in the relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR.

Braeutigam said on Deutschlandfunk on Monday that the quality of relations between Bonn and East Berlin is measured by the Federal Republic on "how this questions will be solved satisfactorily in the interest of the people on both sides." However, the solution to such a difficult problem can not be promoted "by talking about it incessantly in public."

East Berlin raised the levy for Western visitors to the GDR to DM25 per day. Bonn had been trying for a long time to get this amount reduced.

Federal President Karl Carstens and GDR Council of State Chairman Erich Honecker, during a 1-hour talk in Moscow on Sunday, affirmed the intention of Bonn and East Berlin to further develop relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR on the basis of the basic treaty.

CSU-FDP CONFLICT OVER STRAUSS 'INTENSIFIES'

[Excerpts] Giessen/Munich, 14 Nov (DPA) -- The conflict between the CSU and FDP coalition partners in Bonn on the future role of CSU Chairman Franz-Josef Strauss in national politics intensified on Sunday.

After the new FDP Secretary General Irmgard Adam-Schwaetzer had stated at a regional congress in Giessen on Saturday that the FDP regarded Strauss' participation in a new Christian-liberal federal government following new elections on 6 March as being out of the question, CSU General Secretary Edmund Stoiber called on the FDP leadership to withdraw this statement. In the Berlin newspaper DIE WELT, Stoiber said: "Either Herr Genscher corrects this now, or he is no longer our partner."

In relation to the conflict -- which has been smoldering for days -- FDP leader Hans-Dietrich Genscher stated on Deutschlandfunk radio that he would "take part neither in a wrangling over offices nor in a new round of the Strauss discussions."

GREENS AGAINST REARMING, NUCLEAR DEVELOPMENT

[Text] Hagen 14 Nov (DPA) -- If they move into the Bundestag, the Greens "are prepared in principle to assume political responsibility." However, they "do not want to elect a chancellor or support a government program that continues a life-endangering nuclear and armament program." With this decision, a clear majority of the 650 delegates at the federal meeting of the Greens in Hagen supported a federal executive motion on Sunday morning regarding the question of cooperating with other parties. The motion regards the "prevention of NATO counterarming with Pershing II and cruise missiles" and a "halt to the nuclear program" as the Greens' most important task in Parliament.

In the debate on Friday night, representatives from the party in Baden-Wuertemberg in particular warned against formulating demands in such a way that they will be unacceptable to the SPD from the beginning. Federal Chairman Petra Kelly by contrast stated that rather than the Greens approaching the SPD, the Social Democrats should first come clean and explain how they view the future problems of society.

The motion also demands far-reaching measures against the destruction of forests, water pollution and air pollution. Large-scale projects such as the western runway at Frankfurt airport and the fast breeder reactor in Kalkar should be stopped, and instead, alternatives should be found for energy supplies and the desulphurization of waste gas.

Finally, equality and equal opportunities for women in all spheres of life and work is demanded. The Greens are prepared, on the basis of these demands, to sound out in "public talks" with the other parties whether or not the "realization of these vitally important goals" is possible by tolerating a government.

More on Greens' Conference

[Excerpts] Hagen 14 Nov (DPA) -- The Greens do not want to make the Federal Republic "ungovernable," but are in principle ready, if they move into the Bundestag, to take political responsibility. A decision of principle to this effect was taken today in Hagen by the federal delegates conference of the Greens. However, they do not want "to elect a chancellor and support a government that wishes to continue the life-endangering nuclear and armament program."

The 3-day discussion by the 650 delegates, which was continually interrupted by debates on points of order, made it clear that for the Greens, political cooperation is only thinkable with the SPD.

At the same time, however, deep-seated distrust toward what is thought to be the SPD's tactic of embracing the Greens surfaced again and again. Petra Kelly in particular, who in accordance with the principle of rotation of the Green Party gave up her office as one of the three chairman, attacked the SPD sharply. She also reprimanded members of her own party who clearly have an "almost sexual craving" to climb into bed with the SPD. The Greens are facing an historic turning point: Either to be swallowed by the SPD or to show that they are in a position to follow a path of nonviolent structural change.

The Greens, who each year newly elect a half of their 11 executive members, elected at the party conference 36-year-old Rainer Trampert from Hamburg and 59-year old forestry graduate; Wilhelm Knabe from Muelheim as new executive spokesmen. Trampert, who is considered a member of the reformist wing, is a works committee member at a Hamburg oil company. Knabe, who promised in future discussions to "drive Kohl and Genscher into a corner," works at the North Rhine-Westfalia Ecology Institute. The third chairman, Manon Maren Griesebach, retains her post.

SOVIET ACCUSATIONS AGAINST FRG JOURNALIST

[Text] Moscow/Hamburg, 10 Nov (DPA) -- On Wednesday, the Soviet Government paper "IZVESTIYA" reproached Franz Drewer, former DPA correspondent in Moscow, stating that while in Moscow over a considerable period of time, he had illegally acquired rubles for German marks and had been finally caught red-handed while exchanging DM10,000. Drewer himself had admitted to Soviet authorities that he had been engaged in foreign exchange speculations for 2 years. With the rubles he had brought icons, jewelry, antiques and furs in order to take them out of the Soviet Union.

The chief editorial board of the DPA has confirmed that the DPA had given notice to Drewer but refused to make any statements regarding the individual reproaches raised by IZVESTIYA. At present, labor court proceedings are pending and it was not in the interest of the former DPA correspondent to enter into a public discussion about the event.

TV REPORTS ARREST OF TWO TERRORIST SUSPECTS

[From the "Heute" newscast]

[Text] According to information gathered by ZDF, Brigitte Mohnhaupt and Adelheid Schulz, two of the most wanted suspected terrorists, were arrested in Frankfort this afternoon. Details regarding the circumstances of the arrest are not yet known.

Brigitte Mohnhaupt and Adelheid Schulz are suspected of having taken part in the terrorist attacks of 1977, including the assassination of banker Juergen Ponto and the kidnapping and murder of Hans Martin Schleyer, president of the Employer Association.

The most recent reward for the apprehension of the two women amounted to DM100,000 each. Both were considered to be leading figures in the Red Army faction.

REAGAN'S LIFTING OF PIPELINE SANCTIONS REPORTED

LD131908 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 13 Nov 82

[Text] Ronald Reagan has just made a gesture to the Europeans: He is lifting the American embargo on the supply of equipment for the Euro-Siberian pipeline. An agreement, he said, has been reached with Western countries on the conditions of East-West trade.

President Reagan has just effectively announced in his weekly radio address that he has lifted the sanctions against those firms supplying equipment for the construction of the Siberian pipeline. The President stated that the allies have reached -- after months of discussion -- an agreement which will henceforth regulate East-West exchanges in the areas of high technology trade, gas purchases and in all spheres which could benefit Soviet military power.

The allies agree, says Mr Reagan, to undertake a study to find energy sources in Western countries. These allies further agree not to sign any new agreements on the delivery of Soviet gas until these studies have been completed.

President Reagan stressed that this harmonization of American and European policies is beneficial because the United States is convinced that the Atlantic alliance will thus be strengthened. The USSR must understand our desire to negotiate, but we must not place ourselves in a position of inferiority; we must neither benefit the Russian economy nor assist in the growth of Soviet military power.

France Not Involved

LD132014 Paris Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 13 Nov 82

[Text] France is not a party to the agreement announced this afternoon in Washington by Ronald Reagan on the conditions of trade between East and West. A communique from the Ministry of External Relations specifies this evening that France takes note of the American decision to lift the embargo on supplies of equipment destined for the Soviet Union for the construction of the Euro-Siberian pipeline. Even if France is not a party to the agreement, it appears that it took part in the negotiations which led to the agreement being reached.

Jobert on Decision

[Text] We are coming back now to the lifting of the Soviet embargo with Mr Michel Jobert, minister of foreign trade. After the announcement made by President Ronald Reagan on lifting the embargo, Europeans on the whole were satisfied except, as we have already said, for France, which in a communique yesterday made it clear that it is not a party to the agreement negotiated by the United States, which includes a revision of East-West trade.

Here is the reaction of Michel Jobert, who is talking to Gabriel Milesi. Gabriel Milesi first asked the minister of foreign trade why France's reaction was so different from that of the other Europeans.

[Begin recording] [Jobert] France is pleased, too. You know President Reagan made a unilateral decision to impose an embargo in order to inconvenience the Soviet Union. He did not consult his allies and today he has made a unilateral decision to get out of this, to extricate himself from these measures; to lift this embargo. We are pleased that he has done this. This is what we wanted and that is what we have been saying for a very long time. I would add that this U.S. decision is not premature. I mean from the Americans' point of view because, after all, it comes at the moment when Lech Walesa is returning home, when Brezhnev's death leads the United States to try to smooth out some of their differences with the USSR in order to make contact with the new Soviet leaders. Of course, the U.S. President has been forced to lift this embargo which he imposed himself.

[Question] Can it be said that he is also doing this because, in the end, the embargo did not work very well as no one was sticking to it?

[Answer] Well, this measure seemed at first like a measure against the USSR, but in the end, in its economic effects, it was more like a measure against the U.S. allies, who were obliged to rebel against the strictures imposed on them. In somehow trying to take revenge on the USSR, the United States went about it by taking revenge on its own allies. You see, the moral of this story is that what is needed is consultation. The United States must understand that consistent dialogue beforehand with its Western allies [word indistinct] is necessary and indispensable. Otherwise, this occasionally leads to divergent attitudes, to misunderstanding and in the end, common interests are jeopardized. Today it seems that the United States has more or less understood this, even though President Reagan has announced an agreement which, from our point of view, does not exist.

[Question] But it seems that nevertheless, there were negotiations. Are you saying that France was not a party to them?

[Answer] There were what quaint diplomatic jargon calls "non-conversations" in Washington between ambassadors. France followed these nonconversations but it did not agree that the possible result of these negotiations should be tied to the lifting of the embargo. This is what it has said all along. Today France considers that negotiations did take place. That they were not brought to a conclusion and that in consequence, they need to be continued in a framework free of any conditions [dans un terrain absolument deblaye] since the embargo has now been lifted. That means that we can now talk calmly about the organization of economic relations between one part of the world and the other. [Word indistinct], that is the world.

[Question] In as much as the U.S. President has said that he is lifting the embargo because new and more effective measures have been accepted by the majority of the allies and in as much as France rejects these measures, does this mean that there is no chance of the embargo being maintained?

[Answer] But we are not rejecting these measures. We have discussed them, of course. The study has not been brought to its conclusion and therefore it was premature to announce that agreement had been reached on the measures. In fact, there is no agreement on these measures but we must continue to work and seek through consultation -- I want to stress this -- a common ground for agreement. This should be possible.

[Question] Can negotiations now be opened on the basis of the decisions announced yesterday; I mean on the basis of the measures envisaged yesterday -- negotiations which could lead to reforming East-West relations, East-West trade?

[Answer] Let me say first of all that the United States has been trying for several weeks, although not in every sphere, to clear up its areas of disagreement with its allies. There has been a partially satisfactory agreement on European exports of steel to the United States and then there was this preliminary stage to lifting the embargo. This at least has been achieved. Consequently, the ground should be cleared of obstacles in order to arrive at something that results, let me stress again, from good and fair consultations between the allies. [end recording]

JOBERT WANTS TRADE IMBALANCE WITH USSR REDRESSED

[Text] How will trade relations between France and the Soviet Union develop now that there has been a change of leadership in the USSR? Mr Jobert, the minister for external trade, would like the Soviet Union to buy more from France. Trade relations between the two countries show a deficit of FR12 billion. This means the Soviet Union sells more to us than we buy from it. As a result of this, Michel Jobert starts on a new crusade and gives the following warning.

[Begin Jobert recording] The Soviet people want very much to have good relations with France, and in my opinion they are right. This is the best advice I can give them. On the other hand, they have gradually realized that France's deficit with the Soviet Union is too big for it to ignore. We must talk about the FR12 billion deficit with them. This is far too much -- FR12 billion with Japan, FR12 billion with the Soviet Union: This is far too much. If the Soviet Union does not buy enough from us, we shall have to tell them we are not in a position to buy from them -- that is, oil: There have been a few small incidents in the last few weeks as far as the purchase of oil from the Soviet Union is concerned. These were intended as signals. We will not be able to buy gas. We are already buying some and we shall buy more after 1984, but no one can do the impossoble. If they decide to give us industrial orders which would restore the balance, then we would be in full agreement. [end recording]

PARLIAMENT PASSES DEFENSE BUDGET AFTER DEBATE

[Text] The defense budget was adopted last night after an 8-hour debate during which the opposition vehemently criticized the policy of the Defense Ministry which, according to some of the speakers, is gradually changing, -- and I quote some of the speakers -- therefore, running the risk of ultimately making France vulnerable.

Minister Charles Hernu answered his critics for more than an hour in defending his budget. He noted a number of programs, such as the launching of the first nuclear aircraft carrier in the period 1984-1988 and the current study on the development of the fighter plane of the future.

SPADOLINI EXPLAINS RESIGNATION TO PARLIAMENT

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Spadolini has reported to Parliament on the state of crisis which caused the government's resignation. Here is Angelo Haver:

Spadolini's speech in the Chamber ended about twenty minutes ago. He explained the reasons for the resignation submitted yesterday by the government and rejected by the head of state who sent the government back to Parliament's judgment. The prime minister stressed that these reasons stem from the clash between Andreatta and Formica, that is to say between the Christian Democrat minister of treasury and the Socialist minister of finance. Spadolini said that the reason is insurmountable because of the gravity of the clash and the subject matter in dispute at this point. All this happened while the prime minister was abroad and so there were repercussions on public opinion and concern was expressed in all responsible institutional quarters. This fact has become emblematic of a destructive practice of the principle of collective government responsibility and of the prime minister's coordinating powers. To settle this clash by pretending that nothing happened, or as has previously occurred by interpreting the facts in a dismissive way, would have meant doing harm to the credibility of this and future governments, to the prime minister in charge and to those that were to follow.

Spadolini added that we cannot say that the problems are different; the problem of the means to deal with the economic crisis is intimately connected with, and we would like even to say that is inseparable from the question of institutional (?means). If the executive does not maintain unity of political direction, if we cannot find a minimum common denominator, then the attempt to bring together state positions is frustrated; this being the duty of the head of a coalition government. We are faced not by procedural questions but by political ones.

Submits Resignation Again

[Excerpt] Spadolini's resignation is final after the debates in Parliament. Here is a dispatch from the Presidential Palace by Giuseppe Mattei:

The government crisis was marked by its first constitutional procedure in the offices of the republic's presidency. Pertini received Spadolini and Fanfani, chairman of the Senate. Spadolini arrived there at 1630 and talked to Pertini for 45 minutes. He reiterated to the head of state the government's resignation after the debates in the Chamber. Coming out, the prime minister made a statement in answer to our question:

[Begin recording] [Spadolini] I have again handed the government's resignation to the president of the republic in light of the parliamentary debates on the institutional and political condition of the executive, which took place in the Chamber. I faced the debates in the spirit of absolute deference to the head of state, aware of the indissoluble link between Parliament and government and of the danger of any extraparliamentary crisis. I have done my duty and now it is up to the president of the republic and the political forces to have their say.

[Question] The president, therefore, has not yet formally accepted your resignation?

[Answer] The formula is the usual one. The president reserves the right to decide. [end recording]

Resignation Accepted

[Excerpts] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 13 -- Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, the first non-Christian Democrat to head an Italian Government since shortly after World War II, handed head-of-state Sandro Pertini his resignation here this afternoon, thus formally ending the second Spadolini cabinet.

Spadolini gave Pertini his letter of resignation at 1630 local (1530 GMT). The President's Office gave the announcement in a laconic eight-line (?communique) which analysts read as indicating Pertini's determination to get the crisis solved one way or the other as quickly as possible.

The statement said that Pertini would start consultations on the crisis Monday morning. This (?led) the analysts to presume that he would be ready to name a successor to the outgoing premier within a few days.

The government's fall had been in the air since only a few weeks after Spadolini stitched together his second cabinet in August with a complete re-edition of his first administration allying his own Republicans with the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, and Liberals.

Yesterday, Spadolini described the situation, but the coalition parties made it clear to him that they saw his government as finished. But the spokesmen for the five parties also made it clear that they see no viable alternative to the present five-party arrangement.

This led analysts to argue that the present coalition is not in question, just who holds the premiership which will now most probably go to a party with something more than the Republicans' three percent of the electorate. Most analysts agree that solving the crisis will be no easy matter and say that early general elections cannot be ruled out.

According to the smaller opposition parties like the Radicals, the neofascists, and the Proletarian Unity Party, the rivalry between Christian Democrats and Socialists leaves little room for an agreement, so it would be better to think in terms of early elections at once.

The same groupings also came out against entrusting the premiership to someone like Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani, the veteran Christian Democrat, as a stop-gap prime minister to prepare the elections.

Tomorrow and Monday, the leaderships of the various parties will be in session to work out the proposals that their spokesmen will hand to Pertini.

REAGAN PIPELINE DECISION, LETTER TO SPADOLINI

[Excerpts] The Washington administration has made an important decision. The United States embargo on the supplies destined for the European-Siberian gas pipeline has been lifted. Here is Gaston Ortona reporting from New York.

President Reagan announced a short while ago that an agreement had been reached between the Western allies on trade with the Soviets. Because of this he has decided to lift the embargo and the sanctions decreed regarding the products destined for the Siberian gas pipeline.

U.S. President Ronald Reagan has sent a personal letter to Prime Minister Spadolini on the Siberian gas pipeline agreement. Reagan writes: I am very happy that we have been able to reach this agreement so soon after your visit, which was of great value and which ended successfully. Italy's role during the whole course of these negotiations was constructive and socially important. I am also glad, Reagan concludes, that, thanks to this new consensus on the East-West economy, it will no longer be necessary for my administration to apply the provisional measures on the embargo against Nuovo Pignone. The lifting of the sanctions announced by President Reagan (?releases) the four rotors manufactured by General Electric for Nuovo Pignone.

PCI'S PAJETTA, PAPERS COMMENT ON BREZHNEV

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 12 -- The death of Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev and the problem of succession as well as the future of Soviet-style socialism were the dominant themes of editorial comment in the Italian press today.

Milan's CORRIERE DELLA SERA said that the Soviet leader "was the chief of a empire which is sustained only by force and who believed only in force".

The VOCE REPUBBLICANA echoed the theme and said that "Brezhnev revised and modernised the errors of Stalinism and frightened half the world (Asia, Africa and Europe) with the imperial ostentation of his army and his missiles".

Italian Communist Party official Giancarlo Pajetta said in the party paper L'UNITA' "Brezhnev leaves a difficult heredity, weighted with many problems, burdened by crisis. But he leaves a nation and peoples who must also feel the responsibility of understanding that socialism needs the consensus and the participation of democratic life and liberty for every person".

Another party mouthpiece, the Socialists' L'AVANTI echoed this theme and said that "the man who after Stalin, held power in the Soviet Union for the longest period of time, leaves on his death a country which is more powerful militarily but certainly not richer economically and surely less 'attractive' a model for communists throughout the world".

Turin's daily LA STAMPA carried the headline "Brezhnev was the Biggest Conservative To Have Led a Revolution" and went on to say that "his predecessors wanted to change Russia and the world. With Brezhnev the revolution was halted".

Rome's LA REPUBBLICA said that "the great stability achieved by Brezhnev had evolved in the last few years into a petrification of the system which we now see before us".

Milan's conservative IL GIORNALE NUOVO said that "Brezhnev's conservatism had a long life because it held rigid and petrified everything, blowing off the steam of domestic tensions and surplus war production through aggression and imperial adventures abroad".

VATICAN SOURCES ON POLISH CHURCH-STATE AGREEMENT

[Text] Vatican sources have told Madrid radio that the release of the leader of the Polish Solidarity Trade Union, Lech Walesa, forms part of a broader agreement between the Catholic Church and the military government. In exchange for a conciliatory attitude from the Catholic hierarchy and the announcement of the forthcoming visit by John Paul II to Poland, the military régime would, with the release of Walesa, begin the release of all internees and guarantee amnesty for the clandestine Solidarity leaders who give themselves up. At the same time, it is reiterated that martial law would be lifted in Poland before Christmas.

The change in the Polish siutation comes during the period between Brezhnev's death and the election of Andropov as his successor at the head of the CPSU. A Solidarity leader in exile has told Madrid radio that General Jaruzelski, leader of the Polish military regime, it taking advantage of the interval provided by the succession in the Soviet Union to strengthen his position in Poland and with regard to the heir or heirs of Brezhnev.

SWEDEN

BODSTROM ON ACTIVE NEUTRAL FOREIGN POLICY

PM121215 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 7 Nov 82 Supplement p VII

[Undated interview with Swedish Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom by Lars Christiansson: "Criticize Events, Not Nations"]

[Text] "Sweden should not criticize other countries because of their political structures. We must accept states as they are. It must be their own business how they decide to live. Sweden should not make general evaluations of other states. We should leave this to individual parties and contributors to the public debate. Swedish foreign policy should be characterized by good relations with other countries which could inspire confidence in our policy of nonalignment."

Sweden's new foreign minister, Lennart Bodstrom, is responsible for the above analysis of the direction of Swedish foreign policy. "We will react in a way which means Sweden will turn its attention on individual events abroad and will explain why we do so. Sweden will have correct relations with all other countries. We cannot discuss their right to choose their own system."

As an example of how such a policy is put into action, the foreign minister pointed out how Sweden has criticized individual events in other countries. "In the case of Poland, we have said what we think about the actions against Solidarity and against other free organizations," Lennart Bodstrom said. "Our criticism has kept to the concrete facts."

Lennart Bodstrom stressed that the criticism he directed at U.S. activities in Central America in his speech to the United Nations must not be seen as a general criticism of the United States. The country has its own Constitution and its own laws. However, South Africa is an exception. In the light of the UN decision to implement sanctions against the country, the situation is different. The policy of apartheid must be seen as a human rights violation.

"We have condemned the Soviet Union's invasion and continued occupation of Afghanistan. The reason for our criticism was the violation of that country's sovereignty. We have a right to defend not only the individual's freedom around the world, but also a state's national freedom," Bodstrom said.

He developed his view of how this active Swedish foreign policy is to be pursued. Over the years, Sweden has raised the question of various conditions in other countries. In this way, we have clearly shown how far we consider our competence to stretch. "If we look at the pointed exchange going on at present between the United States and the Soviet Union, in which both sides find the other's social system totally wanting, then this is a debate in which we cannot take part."

Bodstrom went on to note that using the UN and the Council of Europe declarations on human rights as the point of departure, there is a framework for what Sweden should react to.

"We are not neutral in our views in Sweden. We are undoubtedly a democratic state with all this means, in terms of freedom of expression, freedom of association and equal rights in public elections. Now I have clarified the fundamental conditions which determine our course of action." This was Lennart Bodstrom's reply when asked whether he supported the view that Sweden, through its values and ideology, belongs to the circle of Western culture and that in this sense our policy of neutrality is not neutral. He stressed that this should not be taken to mean there is enmity with other states.

Asked what the government means when it says it intends to pursue a more active foreign policy and in what way Sweden's foreign policy was passive in the last 6 years, Bodstrom said: "I do not want to comment on my predecessors' policy. Sweden's foreign policy is characterized by great continuity. The last thing the present government is looking for is confrontation over foreign policy. We are striving for broad solutions."

Asked what the phrase active foreign policy means, he replied: "Because of our nonalignment, we have an opportunity to be respected not only in the countries of the two power blocs, but also in all other countries. Sweden should work with the possibilities available, which could lead to peaceful solutions in various conflicts. Nor should we feel reluctant to make statements on events in the world, even though they might be remote from us. Despite our strategic position, the risk of armed confrontation in the Nordic area is not an immediate danger. Nor is it likely that a conflict would break out here." Lennart Bodstrom's analysis concludes with the observation that every regional conflict is a potential danger to world peace. We could find catastrophe upon us as a consequence of a war between countries far from us. This gives us the legitimacy to be active in our foreign policy.

When looking into the question of whether there really is any difference between social democratic and nonsocialist foreign policy, the foreign minister stressed with some pointedness that policy will be formed with Sweden's joint national interests in mind. Since the present government comes from a party which feels a strong sense of international community with brother parties in other countries, it is clear this could have an effect on our policies. "Not only do we have contacts with other states' international representatives, we also have relations of a somewhat greater depth among the peoples. The workers' movement is by its nature international. This has meant that, as well as the official cooperation between countries, there are also ties between the trade union movements and the various Social Democratic parties around the world."

Bodstrom said that it is possible that the Social Democratic Party's contacts with the Central American trade union movements led to the mention of Central America in his UN speech. "Objectively, my remarks were no sharper than those made by Ola Ullsten in his day. I do not think that it will be possible to see any nuances between Social Democratic and nonsocialist foreign policy until the government has been in office for awhile. You will have to follow our activities and our statements. It is possible that something will emerge after a time."

Of foreign confidence in our neutrality, Bodstrom said that there has been no reaction abroad to indicate that it has declined since the submarine incident. "Sweden has a defense system which under the circumstances is relatively strong. It is constructed so that it should inspire confidence in the rest of the world in our nonaligned policy with its goal of neutrality in war. Our endeavors to be self-sufficient in defense materiel to the greatest possible extent and the policy we pursue toward other countries also help guarantee this. In total this could be seen as a kind of guarantee that we are not some kind of outpost of the Western military alliance. It should also be a guarantee for the Western military alliance that we intend to defend our own territory and not abandon it to become an outpost of the East. The converse is also true."

Lennart Bodstrom also considers that it is just as important that the rest of the world understand that strong defenses are reconcilable with our desire to work for general disarmament. There is no conflict between these ambitions. Lennart Bodstrom sees the Palme commission's proposal for the establishment of a zone free from nuclear arms at Europe's focal point and the idea of a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic area as contributions to detente.

The foreign minister commented on the debate on the size of a future possible Nordic nuclear-free zone by saying that it should be as large as possible. "The larger the areas that can be made nuclear-free, the better. We have to start somewhere, and I am confident that there is a strong interest in making the Nordic areas free from nuclear weapons. It is clear that we have authority over our own territories. Then there is the consideration that under international law the Baltic is considered a free ocean. However, this legal ruling must not stop the Nordic countries from exerting all the political pressure and influence they can to win acceptance for the rule that ships carrying nuclear arms must not be stationed in the Baltic. If they were nevertheless to be found there, the nuclear-free zone would lose much of its value...but of course, not all of it. You cannot dismiss the nuclear-free zone with the justification there is little prospect of success in implementing it. The advantages of such a zone are so very great that every possibility of realizing this idea will be tested," Foreign Minister Bodstrom concluded.

THATCHER, QUEEN SEND CONDOLENCES ON BREZHNEV

[James Wightman Report: "Mrs Thatcher Sends Terse Condolences"]

[Excerpt] Mrs Thatcher sent a formal, three-sentence message of condolence to the Kremlin yesterday following the death of President Brezhnev as she and other Western leaders began assessing the implications for East-West relations.

The message, sent to the chairman of the Council of Ministers, said: "On behalf of Her Majesty's government, I send to you and the people of the Soviet Union our condolences on the death of President Brezhnev. As general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union since 1964, and a president of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet from 1960 to 1964 and again since 1977, his wide-ranging and long experience in different fields of public life will be a serious loss to the Soviet Union. The consequences of his death will be felt far beyond the frontiers of his own countries."

The queen also sent a message of sympathy. It read: "I have learned with regret of the death of President Brezhnev. In my own name and on behalf of the British people, I send our sympathy to you and the people of the Soviet Union."

The prime minister's "Iron Lady" detestation of communism and her strongly-expressed disapproval of Russia's conduct over Afghanistan and Poland clearly inhibited her from sending a longer message.

Mrs Thatcher had not met Mr Brezhnev. A Downing Street spokesman said last night that she had not planned a visit to Moscow to meet him, although she has had a standing invitation since 1979 when she made a brief stop-over in Moscow and met Mr Kosygin on her way to a summit in Japan.

Mr Foot, Labor leader, who met Mr Brezhnev in Moscow last September, sent a longer message to the Kremlin. He said: "On behalf of the British labour movement I send my condolences to the Russian people on the death of President Brezhnev. We believe that good relations between this country and the Soviet Union are essential for peace and we have always welcomed contacts with the Soviet leadership."

Mr Foot said that the exchange which he and Mr Healey, deputy leader, had had with Mr Brezhnev last September "left us fully persuaded of his interest in detente and disarmament and his desire to secure results in these fields."

PYM ON EAST BLOC TRADE AFTER SANCTIONS LIFTED

[By Andy Webb]

[Excerpt] Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym today said Britain had not made any concessions to the U.S. as part of a deal before President Reagan lifted sanctions over the Soviet gas pipeline, and he voiced strong opposition to any move towards a trade war with Moscow. Mr Pym said: "There are no concessions. It was a unilateral decision by the Americans to apply sanctions; so it was a unilateral decision to lift them."

But Mr Pym said there had been agreement about the principles underlying trade with Eastern bloc nations. "We ought not to trade in a way that gives the Soviet Union some strategic or military advantage," he said. "We ought not to undertake trade with them in a way which subsidises the Soviet economy."

Speaking on BBC radio's World this weekend, Mr Pym said he wanted NATO's strategy towards the Eastern bloc to concentrate more fully on economic issues. "That in no way implies a trade war with the Soviet Union. I should be quite against that," he said. But he pointed out that it did imply that Britain would consider "details of the framework — the guidelines -- on which all countries should base their trade with the East".

Mr Pym admitted that France had some reservations about this. The foreign secretary said that, while there might have been an element of goodwill towards the new Soviet regime in President Reagan's announcement lifting sanctions, its timing, coinciding with the death of President Brezhnev, was no more than "fortuitous". He said Britain had believed the imposition of sanctions had been "a wrong and unhelpful decision" which had damaged NATO. Sanctions would have hit employment in the UK, with firms involved having to lay off many workers.

FIRM STAND URGED ON EEC FISH QUOTA FOR DENMARK

[Editorial: "Fishing for Sympathy"]

[Text] One can have some sympathy with Denmark's desire to defend important national interests against EEC convenience. Just as Mrs Thatcher's determination to prevent Britain having to pay a disproportionate share of the EEC budget has been one of her most popular causes, so the Danish Fisheries Minister Mr Henning Grove has received fierce support from right across the political spectrum in his rejection of the EEC's proposed common fisheries policy. Denmark, being one of the smaller EEC countries, is understandably even more paranoid about being ruled from Brussels.

On the other hand in this industry, almost uniquely, there is a clear common interest in arriving at an agreed policy between Community members. Gentlemen's agreements have not been sufficient to prevent a dangerous degree of over-fishing for many years past. Too often immature fish have been taken for fishmeal to the detriment of catches of the more valuable white fish later on. In the case of a renewable resource such as fish, there really is a case for some cooperation.

What the Danes do object to, alone of member countries, is the proposed size of their quota of the total allowable catch. In particular they want to take 20,000 tonnes of mackerel off the west coast of Scotland and a large quantity of haddock and cod from round the Shetlands. But the Danes are really hoist on their own petard because the proposed quotas have been related to official figures of recent catches, and Denmark is widely believed to have under-reported the real size of its catches in recent years. If the view of many fisheries experts is correct that the Danish fishermen are the most ruthless and short-sighted in the northern hemisphere (along with the Icelanders) then Britain and the other eight members of the EEC should stand firm on the new common policy.

SPOKESMAN SILENT ON CHAPMAN-BATU MEETING

NC121012 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 12 Nov 82 p 10

[Text] When asked yesterday to comment on the meeting of Mr Chapman, U.S. coordinator for the Cyprus issue on behalf of the U.S. Administration, with Mr Batu, Turkish ambassador in the occupied territories, the government spokesman avoided making comments. Mr Chapman, who was expected to depart Cyprus yesterday, did not meet with Mr Zakharakis, Greek ambassador in Nicosia, during his stay here.

KHARAVYI: No U.S. Support

[From the "Opinion" column" "Take The Challenge..."]

[Text] Mr Chapman says he is not carrying any American plan for Cyprus or any Washington proposals. During his contacts in Cyprus he listens but does not speak because, he says, his mission is merely to obtain information and to be briefed and then to inform and to brief his government. When announcing his appointment as State Department "coordinator" for the Cyprus problem, his government stated that it had decided, again, to assist the UN efforts for a solution to the problem. However, if Washington's intention is to assist the United Nations and not to undertake its own "initiatives," it is wondered why Mr Chapman's visit is taking place "for briefing purposes." Washington knows quite well that the United Nations, which it wants to assist, has a stack of Cyprus resolutions demanding, among other things, the withdrawal of foreign troops -- mainly of the Attila forces -- the return of refugees to their homes, respect for the independence and territorial integrity of the Cyprus Republic and the holding of talks between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots on the constitutional questions. Washington also knows that Turkey refuses to comply with the UN resolutions; that instead of withdrawing its aggressive forces, it is reinforcing them; that it rules out the return of refugees to their homes; that it insists on the partitioning of Cyprus; and that it has rendered the dialogue inactive by dictating to the Turkish Cypriot leadership its totally negative attitude at the negotiating table. Thus, if Washington wishes to assist the United Nations in resolving the Cyprus problem, it only has to help implement the UN resolutions, and it soon will have a first class opportunity to do so: The UN General Assembly debate on Cyprus' recourse for the implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus.

This is the challenge, but Washington will not take it. According to all indications, Washington will not vote at the General Assembly debate in March in favor of Cyprus' demand, which is also a UN demand, since all the resolutions are UN resolutions which have repeatedly been brought back to and reratified by the UN General Assembly. According to all indications, Washington will oppose Cyprus' recourse and will react to the resolutions just as it has reacted every time in the past. In addition to its reaction, it will continue to assist lavishly, not the United Nations, but Ankara so that it may more easily continue to keep Attila in Cyprus.

Washington is not concerned about the UN efforts for a Cyprus solution within the UN framework and in accordance with UN resolutions. Washington is solely concerned about shifting the Cyprus problem from the UN framework to that of NATO and thus imposing a "solution" which would promote U.S.-NATO plans to convert Cyprus into an unsinkable aircraft carrier in the eastern Mediterranean. This is Washington's intention, and this is the goal of its "revived" interest as demonstrated by the Chapman visit. In view of this, it is imperative that there should be increased vigilance on the part of the Cypriot people and their government.

Turkish Ambassador on Talks

NC120925 Nicosia BOZKURT in Turkish 10 Nov 82 pp 1, 6

[Text] Lefkosa [Nicosia] -- Christian Chapman, Cyprus coordinator in the U.S. State Department, visited the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus and conferred with the Turkish Cypriot authorities. Chapman called on head of state Denktas, Turkish Ambassador in Lefkosa Inal Batu and the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Umit Onan separately. His talk with President Denktas lasted about 1 hour. Following his meeting with Christian Chapman, Denktas told journalists that Chapman had come to the island in order to see the realities and learn everything and that he had given Chapman detailed information.

Answering newsmen's questions before his meeting with Denktas, Chapman stressed that it was wrong to think that the purpose of his visit was an attempt to play a more active part in the Cyprus issue following Greek Cypriot head of state Kiprianou's approach to the Kremlin.

Following his meeting with Chapman, Ambassador Inal Batu told journalists that Chapman had come to Cyprus for the purpose of collecting information in connection with his new job and to make contacts with the authorities. Inal Batu stressed that Chapman did not bring any proposals for the settlement of the Cyprus dispute. Batu further stressed that Chapman had not come to the island on a mediation mission similar to that of Philip Habib in Lebanon, and he added: "We have established that reports alleging that Chapman has come to the island on a mediation mission or with a plan prepared by the Americans are not true. The purpose of his visit is to collect information through contacts which will be helpful to him in the performance of his duties. He has only asked questions. We, in turn, explained to him Turkey's views on the Cyprus issue. Recalling that Turkey and the TFSC have always cherished identical views on the Cyprus issue, Inal Batu added that he told Chapman that the only way to the settlement of the Cyprus dispute was the continuation of the intercommunal talks.

Batu further stated that Turkey identified itself with the framework drawn up by the United Nations for the intercommunal talks and that it would continue to support them. Finally, Batu expressed the hope that progress would be made in the intercommunal talks after the [Greek Cypriot presidential] elections.

KIPRIANOU'S CYPRUS SOLUTION IN LOS ANGELES TIMES

[Text] In an article published in the LOS ANGELES TIMES President Kiprianou stresses that currently an opportunity has been offered for an equitable solution of the Cyprus problem, which is a true menace to international peace.

In his article, Kiprianou puts forth the framework for an equitable solution of the Cyprus problem, stressing that the Turkish occupation troops should be immediately withdrawn, a fully independent Republic of Cyprus be established and the basic freedoms and human rights be safeguarded along with the right of all refugees to return to their homes. The president of the republic also reiterates his own proposal for Cyprus' demilitarization and Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's proposal for the stationing in Cyprus of a reinforced UN force, the cost of which will be born by Greece.

DAILY ASKS FOR MORE ACTIVE UN ROLE IN TALKS

NC111550 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 11 Nov 82 p 5

[From the "Positions" column: "The Talks"]

[Text] The intercommunal talks were resumed the day before yesterday after an interruption of over a month. Meanwhile, the assertions that no substantive progress has been achieved so far in the intercommunal talks are well known. On the contrary, the obstacles which the Turkish side interpolates into the talks have increased, a fact that does not allow any optimistic forecasts. The talks are resuming under these conditions. It must be stressed that the dialogue's standstill creates additional responsibilities for the United Nations and its secretary general, who must undertake a more active role and act so the dialogue may bring substantive results. We point out that we expect the UN secretary general to exert every effort that could create the prerequisites for progress to be achieved in the talks. We believe that after the recent talks between President Kiprianou and the Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas at the UN Headquarters, Mr Perez de Cuellar should be in a position to undertake new and more effective actions that would lead to progress in the intercommunal talks.

It should not escape anyone's attention that with the resumption of the new phase of the talks, Ankara and the Turkish Cypriot leadership are arranging new partitionist actions. The influx of Turkish currency into the occupied territories and the decision to remove Cypriot currency are indicative of this. This action, like similar ones that are being promoted by Ankara and Denktas, should be pondered by the UN secretary general and the international community. They should exert every effort so Ankara and Denktas are made to abandon the promotion of their partitioning actions. The role of the international organization will be corrupted and its weakness in protecting world peace and justice uncovered if the contrary takes place.

TURKS IN SOUTH COMPLAIN TO UN ON ARRESTS

[Text] Lefkose, 13 Nov (AA) -- A group of Turks living in southern Cyprus have complained to the U.N. peacekeeping force that they were being ill-treated by Greek Cypriot authorities. Around a dozen Turks met for an hour with a number of U.N. force officers, who are expected to discuss the complaints with Greek Cypriot police. Six Turks have recently been arrested by Greek Cypriot police.

Denktas Denounces Arrests

[Text] President Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriot community neither intended to attack southern Cyprus nor to surrender their rights to the Greek Cypriots. In a statement today, President Denktas criticized the Greek Cypriot treatment of about 200 Turkish Cypriots which remained in southern Cyprus. It will be recalled that several of these Turkish Cypriots have been arrested by the Greek Cypriot administration on charges of spying for the Turkish Federated State. Meanwhile, Greek Cypriot press reports state that a group of the other Turkish Cypriots in southern Cyprus have visited the UNFICYP [UN Force in Cyprus] headquarters and protested against their inhuman treatment by the Greek Cypriot administration.

President Denktas stated that the Turkish Cypriot community could not leave unprotected these 200 Turkish Cypriots who have remained in southern Cyprus. He said that the Federated State has to look after the interests of these Turkish Cypriots. He called on all the world to show interest in these inhuman treatments of a small group of Turkish Cypriots.

On Greek Cypriot charges against several of these Turkish Cypriots, President Denktas said that the Federated State knew the thoughts and preparations of the Greek Cypriot administration and did not need to send spies to southern Cyprus. He added that the Turkish Cypriots were reminded of the Greek Cypriot intentions every time they visited the mass graves of Maratha, Aloa, Sandalaris and Ayios Vasilios.

JOINT EDEK-PASOK STATEMENT ISSUED 12 NOV

[Text] A joint statement on talks conducted by a Socialist EDEK Party delegation with PASOK's Executive Bureau in Athens mentions that national solidarity and the support of the Greek Government and Prime Minster Papandreou are today the most fundamental element for strengthening the Cyprus issue both in the domestic and in the international sectors.

The statement also adds that Papandreou's visit to Cyprus was a climactic national development which stimulated the morale of Cypriot Hellenism. It states that the policy of redefinement protects and strengthens the statehood of the Republic of Cyprus.

The statement underlines the lack of basic progress in the intercommunal talks and underlines that withdrawal of the Turkish troops is a primary factor for the creation of new conditions.

AKROPOLIS CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT NATO POLICY

[From the "Laconic" column: "They Are Playing With Fire"]

[Text] The government has done well not to participate in the NATO exercise in the Aegean. Limnos Island is Greek. We have a right to fortify it as long as there is a real threat to it. Consequently, the allies cannot keep on denying this fact so as not to displease Turkey. However, this is a far cry from using the cancellation of the exercise as a pretext to wage a stormy propaganda campaign against NATO. This is an event that does not serve our national interests but the aims of KKE and its patrons. Our national security depends on NATO. Mr Papandreou also recognizes this. This is why he keeps us in the alliance despite his preference to remain neutral. The press friendly to Papandreou therefore cannot make the allied government appear as a...group of intriguers which is conspiring against Greece. The government was able to prevent such a calamity by giving the matter its true dimensions and explaining to the people what has really happened. However, it presented the matter in such a way -- particularly through the state information media -- that only a few understood what had happened. We very much fear that PASOK and its mouthpiece are carelessly playing with fire and thus undermining the mainstays of our country's security.

I AVYI SCORES AVEROF REMARKS ON NATO EXERCISE

NC101717 Athens I AVYI in Greek 9 Nov 82 p 5

[From the "I AVYI column: "NATO and Our National Security"]

[Text] On the government's cancellation of the NATO exercise Apex Express-82, intended to be held in northern Greece from 10 November until 5 December, Mr Averof found nothing more to say but that the cancellation was done "at the last moment," something which, as he maintains, "harms the country's respectability." Mr Averof, who for many years was also minister of national defense, was neither disturbed nor concerned when NATO refused to accept the use of Limnos Island as a simulated target of an air attack, a fact that questions the security of our borders and thus confirms the "alliance's" alignment with Ankara's claims against our sovereign rights. His devotion to NATO corroded his national sensitivity to such an extent. Moreover, on the Limnos Island issue -- which was raised during last year's exercise -- Mr Averof "silently" aligned himself with the "allied view." After all this, how is it possible for Mr Averof to notice that what the Greek Government "fails" to do -- to inform us that the danger for our national security allegedly comes "from the north" and not "from the east" -- was undertaken on our behalf by NATO, which set the allied exercise in northern Greece and excluded Limnos Island from the military targets. This is why the cancellation of the exercises was a correct action by the government, not only because it supported our national sovereignty from treacherous machinations, but also because it exacerbated to the highest degree the problem of the Turkish threat in the Aegean (as a truly existing problem and not propaganda) and because NATO covered up this threat. There are no margins for illusions any more on the "intenions" of the "allies" for our national security problem. For the people's conscience, withdrawing from NATO's military wing is the next step in the order of the day.

RIZOSPASTIS URGES WITHDRAWAL FROM NATO

[Editorial: "Toward Another Direction"]

[Excerpts] Matters have come to a head. The fresh -- official now -- NATO challenge to our sovereign rights, that is the very challenge to our country's territorial integrity, cannot leave anyone, and mainly the government, room for any other choice. The commencement of procedures for the withdrawal from the wolf alliance -- and as a first step the abolition of the Rogers agreements -- becomes an issue of immediate national priority. It is the duty of every responsible, patriotic quarter of the country to face it as such.

It is maintained by some circles that the problem that has been created by the NATO exercise Apex Express is isolated and circumstantial, that it does not reflect the general logic and attitude of the Atlantic alliance toward our country. But these eager "supporters" of NATO do not take the trouble to explain NATO's persistent refusal to revise even subsequently its provocative demand regarding Limnos and others of our possibly "problematic areas." Thus, they are trying to conceal the fact that their demands precisely constitute a natural continuation of the Atlantic logic, of the very aggressive nature of the bloc.

Such "arguments" which are employed to downgrade the seriousness of the question, solely aims at causing distraction and dangerous confusion. Thus, it is surprising that the prime minister himself, with his statement the other day, fans and backs such reasoning. Of course, he declared that there will be further government reaction when raising the question at the forthcoming NATO session in Brussels. But what can Greece expect from the Atlantic meeting? What can it expect from those who declare opposition to our sovereign rights?

Fundamental national dignity, realism and prudence should have guided the government steps in another direction to prove by deeds, not with nice words, the existence of a "proud foreign policy," so that our abundant declarations about our national independence and security and the government "No" may acquire substantive content. The government is faced with very serious responsibilities.

NEW DEMOCRACY ASSAILS PASOK OVER LIMNOS ISSUE

[Text] New Democracy accused the government of lacking sangfroid and of irresponsible handling of foreign affairs in connection with the Limnos question, and pointed out that the problem lies in the fact that Turkey is misinterpreting the Montreux treaty and is challenging Greece's right to fortify Limnos, and not that it challenges our sovereign rights over the island, something that would justify Mr Papandreou's alarming language.

This established fact, as well as the appraisal by some of the press that the government's attitude is aimed at domestic consumption, were answered by the government spokesman as follows:

"The prime minister's statement was precisely the measure that is required by national interests. The prime minister's message was a message that is made imperative by the priority that should be given to the national issue by all Greeks and by all those who are living in comfort a great distance from the frontiers. It must also be stressed that the border areas are enjoying lively economic activities."

In its statement, New Democracy stressed the following: "It is obvious that the PASOK government is handling the Limnos question without a sense of responsibility and with lack of sangfroid, which are generally characteristics of its foreign policy.

"But regardless of this, so that no false impressions may be formed, it must be clarified that no one, not even Turkey, has ever challenged our sovereign rights over Limnos.

"Turkey, by flagrantly misinterpreting the Montreux treaty, challenges Greece's right to fortify Limnos.

"And in this way it is causing a problem for the Atlantic alliance as well. This is precisely where the question lies."

AKROPOLIS SCORES TURKEY FOR 'VIOLATING' TREATIES

[From the "Laconic" column: "Who Violates Treaties?"]

[Text] Ankara will not point out to us what our rights and obligations are. They are the last ones that can give us or others lessons in behaviour because they have violated international laws and disregarded all UN resolutions on the Cyprus issue. They tell us we have no right to fortify our border islands and they cite the Lausanne Treaty but not the Montreux Treaty. Apparently they consider valid only the treaties they like. Yet they cannot even cite the Lausanne treaty simply because they are the ones violating it, not we. The Lausanne treaty defined our country's boundaries but now Ankara is disputing them — that is, essentially they dispute the treaty that defined them. Furthermore, they resort to actions which clearly show that, given the opportunity, they will dynamically promote their designs against Greece. At the same time, they demand that we respect to the letter the treaty they dispute. Heads they win, tails we lose. Nevertheless the issue would not have arisen if Ankara had not initiated it.

SPOKESMAN DISCUSSES LEGAL STATUS OF LIMNOS

NC130754 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 2200 GMT 12 Nov 82

[Text] In a statement on the legal status of Limnos Island, the government spokesman has stressed that the Montreux treaty abolished the ban on the fortifying the island imposed earlier by the Lausanne treaty.

On the other hand, a government source has stated that the Greek Government does not accept any discussion on the legal status of Limnos. In 1977, Turkey stated that it would not participate in a NATO exercise if Limnos were included. The same source added, however, that based on the NATO general defense plan approved in August 1979 by the Political Committee of the alliance, the chief of staff maintains that there is no justification not to include the islands -- Limnos as well — in the scheduled zone of operations. The same defense plan, which has remained unchanged since 1968, stipulates that the alliance and the commander of its forces in southern Europe have a mission to defend the territorial integrity of the region, without discrimination to land or sea area. (?The Luns order), therefore, is out of order because there is a ruling by NATO's legal bureau that Greece is not subject to an restrictions with regard to Limnos, on the basis of the Montreux treaty. It is also stressed that in 1977, Greece demanded credits from NATO for the construction of the Limnos military airfield, credits which it received. Moreover, NATO experts accepted a request from the Greek side and visited Limnos within the framework of inspecting military installations in our country. Finally, it is stressed that Limnos was included in three map exercises which were recently held by NATO's staff.

The actions of the Greek Government, stressed the Greek Government source, have, therefore, been not only advisable but also imperative. Otherwise, it would have been as if Greece were accepting an amendment of the basic plan of the Atlantic alliance as well as prejudgment of control over Aegean air defense.

DEPUTIES WARN OF IRREGULARITIES IN ARMED FORCES

NC131420 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 12 Nov 82 p 2

[Text] Two deputies from the army's ranks, cadres of ASPIDA [Officers, Save Fatherland, Ideals of Democracy and Meritocracy] -- according to the charges that were levelled against them during the celebrated trial before the dictatorship -- in their first interpellation since being expelled from PASOK note "strange phenomena" in the sensitive area of the armed forces. In the interpellation they personally attacked the prime minister with tough language.

"We are experiencing" -- they report -- "these days, unprecedented and strange phenomena that have appeared in the sensitive area of our armed forces under the blessing of a political leadership that is inexperienced in military matters. Specifically, the following have taken place:

"Soldiers' uniforms in the three branches of the armed forces have been abolished during off duty hours. A newspaper very close to the government has described the honorable uniform of the soldier as a 'demon.'

"Masked soldiers from all three branches of the armed forces have given press conferences 'in uniform' on 'trade union freedoms' and 'the unbearably tough behavior of their superiors,' 'reduction of service' and so forth, in full view of responsible state officials.

"The incident of indiscipline by a first year cadet who praised the leader of a political party inside the officers child care center.

"The abolition of regular entrance examinations for senior military schools and the introduction of participation in common examinations of a certain type of studies for high school graduates. In other words, the special tests for tracing the spiritual, moral and physical capacities that should form the basis for further examinations of a competitor's intellectual level are being abolished.

"All the above reduce military readiness and are the ill-considered basis for the alleged democratization of the armed forces, because they do anything but contribute in that direction. Conscious discipline and correct democratization are not found in such measures which are the direct opposites of military discipline and serve to undermine the national spirit of the armed citizens and their leaders."

"The whole affair is a suspect fake-up," Mr Dhrosoyiannis said. Finally, he pointed out that these same people were circulating leaflets of a very inflammatory content to undermine the armed forces.

Evren 12 Nov Address

[Radio and television speech by President Kenan Evren on the occasion of the constitutional referendum and his assumption of the presidency; 12 November 1982 -- recorded]

[Text] My dear citizens, the Turkish republican states's new Constitution, which was criticized for a long time and which was considered by various circles to be good or bad, was submitted to a public vote on 7 November 1982. The results of this referendum have been announced by the High Election Council. It has been observed at the end of the referendum that 91 percent of our citizens who had the right to vote came to the polls with their children in their laps, or without having had time to get out of their wedding dresses, or by getting out of their sickbeds, or by cutting short their vacations and despite unfavorable weather conditions. Thus they exercised one of their most important political rights under the absolute supervision of the judiciary and in great freedom. This high rate of participation has seldom been seen in our country or in any country ruled by a free democratic system.

First of all, I would like to sincerely congratulate my dear citizens for the high degree of political responsibility they have displayed. This high rate of participation will be an extremely valuable support for the future vitality, stength and power of the free Turkish democracy. I have no doubt that the high sense of political consciousness displayed by our citizens in this country -- which should be considered a new arrival into the free democratic system and its implementation, given that system's history in the world -- will bring deep respect and admiration from the whole world since it shows how categorically determined the Turkish nation is to have freedom and democracy.

We have a right to be very proud of having achieved such a high rate of participation. Accepted and approved by 91.5 percent of the valid votes cast by the Turkish nation -- votes cast in line with the law -- the new Constitution of the Turkish Republic gains the character, identity, strength and validity of a Constitution legislated directly by the Turkish nation, as pointed out in its first section. May the 1982 Constitution be auspicious for our state, country and our dear nation.

By participating in the constitutional referendum with the high rate of 91 percent and by approving the Constitution with all its heart with a vote of 91.5 percent, the Turkish nation has passed the test of democracy with an unprecedented success before the world and has added another praiseworthy page to its young and fresh history of democracy. There were no significant differences in the votes cast in the various corners of our country, in the cities, towns and villages. Also, the new Constitution was approved with an almost similar rate of votes in the various parts of our country, as if it was approved by the national will with a single voice.

These two points constitute an exemplary lesson to our friends and enemies alike, both inside and outside Turkey, on how to see Turkey.

It is clear that, as in its past, the Turkish nation has national unity, national integrity, national solidarity and national togetherness. And it is always capable of proving this to the entire world whenever necessary with fantastic examples.

As in its national struggle and war of independence, the Turkish nation has always managed, through national unity, to overcome all dangers, whenever its country, state, high national character or values -- in short, whenever its national existence -- has been threatened, no matter at what point or stage of its history, and no matter by what grave, terrifying or great attack, threat or trap.

Although its roots go back thousands of years, the Turkish nation is still young, vigorous, full of determination, will, life and energy, a young and great nation. The Turkish nation cpnsiders it its national and historic duty to protect its high and unique national qualities and values -- which have made it one of the greatest nations in history and currently as well -- and to further strengthen them by adding new ones.

We must not forget that as the present-day generation of the eternal and great Turkish nation and as the lucky and honored sons of our heroic ancestors, we must leave honor and pride to the coming Turkish generations. It is our greatest happiness to be the proud members of this great nation.

My dear citizens, by turning this Constitution into a manifestation and product of the Turkish nation's will through your votes, you have opened a new stage in the history of the Turkish republic, and you have restored a new improved structure, new duties, a new form of operation, a new mentality, a new energy and vitality to our state, and a brand new spirit of national unity and solidarity to our nation.

Furthermore, you have shown your determination to protect your rights and freedoms, and have given a new example of how strongly and sincerely the Turkish nation has adopted the free democratic system; you have also displayed the national will on this issue. In the analysis of the reasons which led to the 12 September operation, you have reached a decision, through a national consensus, about the sagacity and patriotism of the Turkish Armed Forces -- which are inalienable from your brothers, sons and yourselves -- in that operation. You have documented your condemnation of the pre-12 September anarcy, terrorism and secessionism; your condemnation of those who caused, willingly or unwillingly, that dark period in the country and of those who remained indifferent and irresponsibly silent before the fall toward catastrophe. You have also documented the national confidence through your various displays of love for and trust in my speeches and promises. You have renewed and enhanced the trustworthiness of the Turkish state within the country, and upheld its respectability and prestige before all the world's nations. From now on, nobody, either inside or outside the country, will be able to see or show the slightest reason to doubt the Turkish nation's determination to protect its freedom and democracy.

I hope that the entire world, and especially the certain European countries who have tried to slander our administration and interfere in our internal affairs at every opportunity since 12 September 1980, will relinquish their negative attitude and behavior and respectfully recognize our lofty nation's great decision and will.

I also hope that those circles and persons among us who have not yet accepted the 12 September administration will forget the past, respect the national consensus and national will, obey the nation's orders and realize their obligation to be truly loyal to the Constitution. Only in this way will they be on the right path.

My dear citizens, at the start of this new stage of the Turkish Republic's history, which you have begun through your approval of the Constitution, let us not forget our past sufferings; but let us not discuss them unless we have to. Let us look at the bright and happy future of our Turkey in the national unity and solidarity which we have proved once again to history and the world. And let us prepare and bring to life that future. Let us turn our nation into a community of tranquillity, prosperity and security by equipping the Turkish Republic, in national solidarity and with the spirit of justice, and as cited in the Constitution, with the qualities existing in a democratic, secular and social state of law respecting human rights and loyal to Ataturk's nationalism.

Let us respect each other's rights and freedoms, dignity, honor and personality, as the members of a single family who live together and who are ready to make sacrifices for each other. Let us prepare for a life full of love and sincerity for each other. Let us protect our Constitution, our free democracy, our state and its institutions. Let us use our national qualities to uphold the principle of "peace at home, peace in the world." Let us follow in the footsteps of the principles and reforms of our great leader Ataturk, the founder of the republic whom we commemorated 2 days ago, on the 44th anniversary of his death. Let us build our country through science. Let us unite our efforts to become a prosperous community living in peace, freedom and security in this paradise of a land which was bequeathed to us by our forefathers with a great loss of life and bloodshed, and where we can see the four seasons in one day. Let us work not only for ourselves but for our children and the coming generations.

My dear citizens, with these wishes, yearnings and beliefs, we approach the goal of establishing, within the framework of the Constitution, the Turkish Grand National Assembly, the last stage in our program for achieving parliamentary democracy -- a system we have adopted as a nation. For this purpose, the necessary laws are being prepared to ensure that the general elections to the assembly are held in October 1983, unless of course there is an important and justifiable reason not to do so. This time next year we will be very happy to see, as a nation, the Turkish Grand National Assembly -- which will be the nation's only representative within our democratic system -- carry out its legislative powers on behalf of the nation, and to pave the way for the establishment of the Council of Ministers which will carry out the executive powers and duties. We will then live our real joy and pride in the moral presence of the founder of our state, the great Ataturk.

I received many cables and letters from thousands of citizens both inside and outside the country before and after the constitutional referendum, praising the Constitution. This great concern and support brought tears to our eyes. I read all these messages and assessed them. All my citizens will realize how hard it is to answer all these messages separately in a short time. I thank the citizens who wrote to me and all those who participated in the referendum. I gave you my love and respect.

OFFICIAL SAYS PAPANDREOU CREATES NEW TENSION

[Text] Ankara, Nov 12 (AA) -- Foreign Ministry spokesman Nazmi Akiman said Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou of Greece had been observed recently in an attempt to create new elements of tension in Turkish-Greek relations.

It was becoming evident, Akiman said, that Mr Papandreou did not intend to follow a consistent or constructive policy in relations between the two countries, citing inconsistent shifts in his statements since his coming into office after election.

Following a gentleman's agreement to reduce tension between the two countries in early summer, Premier Papandreou had in recent months kept on violating the gentleman's agreement he had proposed himself.

He keeps speaking of an imaginary Turkish threat "which one well knows does not exist," and recently went so far as to visit troops on the eastern Aegean islands of Limnos and Lesbos and to speak of a Turkish-Greek war.

The Greek prime minister either is unaware or does not care about the damage done to the peaceful settlement of bilateral disputes by his behaviour, Akiman supposed.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman warned "the patience" of the Turkish government, "resulting from our sense of responsibility should not be "miscalculated."

The demilitarized status of the eastern Aegean islands under the treaties of Lausanne in 1923 and of Paris in 1947, were clear-cut, Akiman said, and there was no reason the island of Limnos was less important than the others for Turkey's security. The Montreux convention of 1936, which Papandreou mentioned, expressly allows for the militarization of the Turkish Straits only, but does not allow for militarization of the Aegean Islands, he noted.

Although she finds it unnecessary to respond to Mr Papandreou's irresponsible statements in the same vein, the Turkish Government is determined to protect her rights and interests based on international treaties just as much as she respects the rights of her neighbours, Akiman said, adding the hope that Papandreou would not sacrifice a matter as vital as Turkish-Greek relations for lesser reasons.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES GREEK CYPRIOT CHARGES

[Text] Foreign Ministry spokesman Ambassador Nazmi Akiman has said that Greek Cypriot press reports that Turkey has proposed to Greece that it would gradually withdraw its troops from Cyprus, are unfounded. These reports claim that in a message he sent to Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, through the good offices of the Romanian foreign minister, President Evren proposed to gradually withdraw Turkish troops from Cyprus.

Answering a question by correspondents on this subject, Ambassador Akiman said: Our president has sent no message to the Greek prime minister. Turkey's policies on the Cyprus problem are clear and well-known by third parties. Turkey believes that a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus problem can be reached through intercommunal talks to be held in accordance with the determined framework. Turkey supports the process of negotiations. According to the framework within which these talks are being conducted, no subjects concerning the future status of Cyprus are being discussed at this stage.

PAPER CITES NEED TO DEMILITARIZE LIMNOS ISLAND

NC150947 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 10 Nov 82 pp 1, 11

[Text] Athens (HURRIYET) -- After having fallen out with NATO, Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou toured units on the Turkish border and tried to boost the morale of his soldiers. At a meeting with the officers at Dedeagac (Alexandropolis) he told them that Greece was on good terms with its northern neighbors, but that there were serious issues between Greece and its eastern neighbor, Turkey. Papandreou gave expression "to the possibility of a conflict with Turkey."

Papandreou said "a war with our northern neighbors would lead to a world war but war with Turkey would be a local one." Recalling the way NATO behaved in the case of Limnos, he reiterated his contention that the real danger to Greece emanates from the east.

While no one attached any meaning to his surprise visits to units on the Turkish border and on Limnos and Mitilini, Papandreou spoke at the festival known as (Cebroyil). [as published], the "guardian angel of the Greek Air Force, at which he said: "the island of Limnos belongs to Greece, and according to the Montreux treaty, Greece is entitled to militarize the island. Refusal by NATO to recognize this right of Greece in respect of exercises is an unacceptable development for Greece."

Turkey will never consent to Greek militarization of the island of Limnos which is opposite the Strait of Dardanelles and which is of paramount strategic important to Turkey. When necessary, Turkey will reply to representations made by Greece to NATO in this respect.

The authorities have in fact stated that even if all the outstanding issues between Turkey and Greece were to be resolved, no friendship could be established between the two countries as long as Greece refuses to demilitarize the Aegean Islands. The authorities have also stated that if Foriegn Ministers Turkmen and Kharalambopoulos at their meeting in Brussels on 9 December agree to continue the dialogue, Turkey will insist on the demilitarization of Limnos Island, and that if necessary, it will "take a stand [tavir koymak]."

Foreign Ministry spokesman Ambassador Nazmi Akiman said this in reply to a question by a journalist in connection with Papandreou's statement on the arming of Limnos Island by Greece: "The statement made by Papandreou the other day concerning Limnos Island is an arbitrary comment which has no legal foundation whatsoever concerning this island's legal status as established by treaties."

On the other hand, the discussions started in connection with our expanded and modernized military airfields in eastern and central Anatolia are continuing. Reports that Turkey has signed a secret agreement with the United States regarding the development of the airfields have not been confirmed. Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman has stated that "Turkey is not involved in any undertaking outside NATO."

FINANCE MINISTER GIVES ASSEMBLY 1983 BUDGET

[Text] Ankara, Nov 12 (AA) -- Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu said the target of the draft budget for fiscal year 1983 was to hold inflation down to a 20 percent rate while attaining a growth rate of 4.8 percent.

Introducing the fiscal '83 budget to the plenary session of the Consultative Assembly on Friday, with members of the National Security Council, Premier Bulent Ulusu and his ministers also attending, Kafaoglu noted the new budget would be one-fourth the size of GNP.

During the 10-month budget period for 1982, the money supply went up by 12 percent and money in circulation by 3 percent, he said, while direct credits by the Central Bank to the public sector increased only by 2.3 percent. Total credits in the economy rose by 12.9 percent.

Next year's monetary policy, the minister said, would be aimed at enabling the money and securities markets to operate on realistic interest rates.

With lowering of some taxes and an increase in the civil service coefficient to 34, civil servants and other public sector employees would enjoy an income increase of 21-22 percent in 1983. However, raising the coefficient to 35, as proposed by the budget committee, would place an additional burden of 60 billion tl on the Treasury, and hence was unacceptable, as it would unbalance the budget.

He promised there would be no deficit financing from the Central Bank for state enterprises.

The money and securities markets would be separated (?with) facilities provided for new security issues intended to pull down interest rates automatically, instead of direct intervention in the rates.

Tax control would be reenforced and the fiscal administration reformed, while adjustments would be made in the tax laws, Kafaoglu announced.

Fiscal policy would aim at stability as well as removing obstacles to development, he said, reminding that 1984 would be first year of a new 5 year development plan.

[Text] Ankara, 13 Nov (AA) -- Replying to criticism Saturday at the Consultative Assembly during a debate on 1983 fiscal budget law, Finance Minister Kafaoglu said that if the austerity program is implemented in 1984 as well, by that time inflation should hopefully be pulled down to below a 10 percent rate.

With the implementation of the austerity program adopted in January 1980, Kafaoglu said, discrepancies had occurred betweenthe program and the 5-year development plan. Exports, for instance, had surpassed the targets set in the plan.

The 1983 budget was "not balanced," Kafaoglu admitted, for it was designed to reduce the inflation rate.

The raising of the civil service salaries coefficient from the government-proposed 34 to 35 was "up to the discretion of the assembly," Kafaoglu said.

A large number of investment projects had been taken over in September 1980, and the backlog of such projects would be depleted only in 1984.

He acknowledged the slow down in the exportation of manpower and in new jobs at home, predicting unemployment could be dealt with when the real growth rate goes up to 6.5 or over. He hoped to approach such a rate in 1984.

The minister also admitted the cost of living index and the wholesale price index procedure dates from back in 1939, and would be updated.

Municipalities and other public agencies owed the Treasury 110 billion tl in tax arrears, Kafaoglu announced.

[Text] Ankara, 13 Nov (AA) -- Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin announced a new development plan would be submitted to the approval of the Consultative Assembly in the first half of 1983. The plan will cover five years from 1984.

Addressing the assembly during the debate on the state planning organization 1983 budget, Pasin said exportation in 1983 was estimated at 7.1 billion U.S. dollars. Turkish exports had already shown a structural change, with manufactured good exports rising and the ratio of crop exports falling, while the importing countries changed as well.

The estimated growth rate for 1983 was 4.8 percent, he confirmed, while the share of exports in GNP was expected to rise from 7.9 percent in 1981 and 10.1 percent in 1982 to 13 percent in 1983.

He also confirmed a monetary policy in keeping with the "economic stability program" would be maintained next year. Appropriations for public capital investment would be around 1.259 billion TL.

The distribution of public investment between sectors would be as follows: 11.3 percent in agriculture, 9.4 percent in mining, 16.3 percent in the manufacturing industry, 23.8 percent in energy, and 19.2 percent in transport and communications.

An increase of 5.7 percent was expected in total investment in 1983 over 1982.

Over 100 special committees had been set up to help draft the new five-year developing plan, Pasn announced.

LABOR MINISTER DISCUSSES WORKERS' PROBLEMS

[Text] Labor Minister Turhan Esener has said that the main problem facing Turkish workers employed in the Middle East and North Africa is the difficulty they encounter in transferring their savings to Turkey. He added that the necessary steps are being taken to solve these problems.

Replying to questions by ANATOLIA, Esener pointed out that about 150,000 Turkish workers were employed in Middle Eastern and North African countries, and that the number of workers to be sent to Iraq could rise next year. Esener recalled that Saudi Arabia had a great investment potential, adding that he expected the number of workers being sent to that country to continue to rise. The labor minister stated that most of the problems being encountered by the Turkish workers arose from their ignorance of the particular country's values, labor and living conditions. He added that guidebooks on the working and social security conditions in Saudi Arabia, Libya and Iraq were being printed and would soon be distributed to Turkish workers.

Esener then said: The Job and Worker Placement Institute carries out all the procedures necessary for Turkish workers to leave the country to be employed by Turkish contractors abroad. It is absolutely forbidden for any other body to carry out this mediation. Those who do so are being punished. Our citizens must apply only to the institute for such procedures.

The labor minister pointed out that thanks to labor agreements signed with countries which employ Turkish workers; travel by the workers to those countries has become organized, and their exploitation by local or foreign mediators has been prevented. Esener stated that preparations have been completed to sign such an agreement with Iraq.

The delegation members called on Housing and Reconstruction Minister Ahmet Samsunlu in the afternoon. At the meeting Samsunlu said that the relations between Turkey and friendly and brotherly Iraq had developed especially in the recent years. Noting that Turkish contractors were carrying out numerous projects in Iraq, Samsunlu said that solutions would be sought for their problems during the meetings in Ankara.

The head of the Iraqi delegation said that during their stay in Turkey, they wanted to closely study important construction projects and make use of their technical characteristics.

The Iraqi delegation also visited the Ministry of Commerce, the Ministry of Industry and Technology and the Foreign Ministry today. After Ankara, the delegation members will go to Izmir and Istanbul to study construction projects. They will leave Turkey on 20 November.

Meeting With Businessmen

[Text] The Iraqi Housing and Reconstruction Ministry delegation which arrived in Turkey yesterday held a meeting with Turkish businessmen in Ankara today. In a speech at the meeting, Nurettin Kocak, who is the chairman of the Turkish Construction and Installations Contractors Union, said that the development of economic and commerical relations between the two countries would benefit them both. Kocak noted that Iraq had received the lion's share of Turkey's exports this year. However, he added, Turkish contractor services in Iraq were not at the desired level. Kocak stressed that the Turkish construction sector had grown to a level where it could meet twice the country's needs. He added that they wanted to do more business in Iraq in order to make use of that potential.

In his speech, the head of the Iraqi delegation, (Ibrahim Taheyati), said that their development efforts had not stopped despite the continuing war. He said that from now on they would give more opportunities to Turkish contractors to participate in the public works and construction projects in Iraq.

The delegation members also called on Public Works Minister Tahsin Onalp today.

ANDROPOV INVITATION; VIENNA AVAILABLE FOR SUMMIT

AU151315 Vienna KRONEN ZEITUNG in German 14 Nov 82 p 2

[Peter Gnam report: "Brezhnev's Funeral Will Be a TV Supershow: United States and China Represented by Top Delegations: Reagan Praise for the New Kremlin Boss, Mutual Sounding Out of Superpowers After Brezhnev's Death"]

[Excerpts] As far as Austria is concerned, the new Kremlin chief is a rather unknown quantity here. Chancellor Kreisky has never met him and if he has, then only inadvertently within the framework of a banquet. But Andropov already has an invitation from the chancellor to visit Austria which was extended to him after Andropov moved to the post held by chief ideologist Suslov. "At that time, Andropov let us know that he very much appreciated this invitation. Naturally, the invitation still stands."

According to Kreisky's information, the new Kremlin chief is "very sociable and well educated" and "comes from the camp of intellectuals." He allegedly is "certainly not a weak person"; on the other hand, he lacks the extreme, brutal ruthlessness of a Stalin because -- according to Kreisky -- "the people in the Kremlin have picked someone under whom they can sleep peacefully."

With respect to what the new man means for world politics, Kreisky affirmed that there could now be a good new beginning. Before his meeting with U.S. President Reagan in January, our chancellor praised the "wise attitude of the United States" vis-a-vis the new Kremlin chief, an attitude which does not, a priori, aim at a confrontation.

With respect to a possible summit meeting between Reagan and Andropov in the coming few months, Chancellor Kreisky stated yesterday: "Vienna is available if it is so desired." A summit meeting between the new Kremlin boss and the Chinese leadership is also considered possible. Both sides seem interested in preventing the thaw of the past few months from reversing itself into another ice age. Kreisky's summary on the relations among the powerful of this world: "Things have calmed down greatly since the stupid, idle talk of some people has ended."

He will be accompanied by Foreign Minister Chnoupek, Foreign Trade Minister Urban and by Federal Assembly Deputy Chairman Kucera. The postponement of the visit by one day was necessary because of the death of Soviet state and party head Brezhnev and his funeral scheduled for Monday, for which Husak will travel to Moscow.

NETHERLANDS

INTERNAL PRESSURES WILL MODIFY U.S. POLICY

PM150909 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 8 Nov 82 p 7

[Editorial: "Tough Words"]

[Text] For the third time in 2 weeks Soviet President Brezhnev yesterday directed at Washington some tough words concerning the problems of disarmament and detente. For the time being, he used warning rather than threatening words. Brezhnev indicated that his country would not shrink from a U.S. challenge to another round of the arms race and that it has no plans to abandon the military parity which it has achieved.

With such statements as these, the Russian leader is able to lock onto what are still areas of uncertainty in U.S. policy. At the end of 1980, President Reagan came to power with a program of which the restoration of U.S. military superiority was a cornerstone, and his original intention was not to resume the talks with the Russians, which had been broken off by President Carter after the invasion of Afghanistan, until a significant part of this program was completed.

In the meantime, Reagan has moved away from this strategy, partly under pressure from the peace movement in Europe and in particular in the United States itself. This has made resumption of U.S.-Russian talks on Nuclear armaments possible -- first on Euromissiles and then on intercontinental missiles. But at the same time, the U.S. Department of Defense in particular has been playing with the idea of forcing the Soviet Union to its knees through an economically exhausting arms race and with military strategies in which the prevention of a nuclear war is no longer the central concern, but rather the waging of a nuclear war over a lengthy period.

In addition, what Gen Maxwell D. Taylor said a year ago is still true -- that on the whole, the present U.S. Administration does not have a military policy worthy of the name, since it is fixated upon a Soviet terror formulated in all too general terms and loses sight of other dangers, which Taylor considers more likely.

Something similar is also true of Reagan's foreign policy, which still has no clear outline and which in the last year has as the WASHINGTON POST remarked recently, succeeded in souring relations with the European Community and the People's Republic of China as well as relations with the Soviet Union.

To all of this must be added the fact that only through massive national borrowing, with all the negative effects such borrowing would have on economic recovery, would the United States be able to finance Reagan's original military plans. This as a result of the fact that the President's economic measures have not lead to the expected economic upturn.

As far as this is concerned, there is also now a growing realization within Reagan's Republican Party that he has gone as far as he can go and that military spending must be tailored to economic realities.

It is to be expected that this internal U.S. pressure on the White House finally will be much more important for U.S. military and foreign policy than the hard words from Moscow.

JOINT STATEMENT ISSUED ON EGYPT'S 'ALI'S VISIT

NC102032 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1720 GMT 10 Nov 82

[Text] Ottawa, 10 Nov (MENA) -- A joint statement was issued today on the official visit paid by Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali to Canada from 8 to 9 November at the invitation of Canadian Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Allan MacEachen.

The statement said that the talks between the two ministers dealt with matters pertaining to the international situation and other questions of mutual interest, especially the situation in the Middle East. The two sides reaffirmed their support for Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity and called for the immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces and other foreign forces from Lebanon. The Canadian side expressed support for the wise policy pursued by the Arab Republic of Egypt under the leadership of President Husni Mubarak -- a policy which contributes to peace and cements stability in the region.

The two sides expressed concern over the lack of progress in the efforts for a peaceful settlement of the Palestinian issue. They reaffirmed their stand as well as their conviction that a settlement of the dispute in the Middle East must come through recognition of the Palestinian people's legitimate rights, including their right to a homeland in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and through guaranteeing the security of all the countries in the area, including Israel, within secure and recognized borders in accordance with [UN Security Council] Resolution 242. The two sides again affirmed their extreme concern over the policy of building Israeli settlements in the occupied territories. The two sides welcomed the initiative announced by U.S. President Ronald Reagan on 1 September 1982 as a starting point toward the establishment of peace in the Middle East. The two sides considered the resolution issued by the Fes summit as a positive development in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Canada welcomed the Egyptian initiative submitted during the 36th session of the UN General Assembly which called for appointing a special UN secretary general representative to discuss the possibility of setting up a nuclear free zone in the Middle East with the parties concerned. This is because both Egypt and Canada are committed to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty that has been ratified by 115 countries so far. The two sides expressed hope that the countries which have not yet ratified the treaty would do so.

In the field of bilateral relations, the two sides agreed that these relations have been marked by a high degree of understanding and joint cooperation. They expressed their satisfaction over the recent deepening and intensification of their relations in important domains such as trade and development. The two sides expressed the belief that the exchange of letters on allowing the Canadian Institute for Historic Studies to open an office in Egypt constitutes an important step in cooperation in the study of Egypt's history. The two ministers also welcomed the cultural, scientific and educational achievements that have been realized between the two countries.

At the end of their talks, the two ministers exchanged instruments on the start of the validity of the agreement signed between the two countries in May on developing cooperation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The two sides expressed satisfaction over the start of the implementation of the agreement and look forward to further meetings between officials of the two countries.

KOHL U.S. VISIT CONTINUES WITH DINNER, SPEECH

[Text] Washington, 16 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl has welcomed U.S. President Ronald Reagan's determination to restore the United States to a strong and respected position in the world, as benefits this great country.

At a dinner hosted by Reagan on Monday evening [15 Nov] for the federal chancellor and a small circle of his advisers, Kohl said according to a prepared text that America's friends and partners welcomed America's "new self-confidence." He said he is sure that the American people, with their vitality, will overcome the difficult problems of our times.

Kohl reaffirmed that the alliance and close friendship and partnership with the United States remains the foundation of his policy.

Kohl is the first foreign leader to be received by Reagan in the private apartments on the first floor of the White House. The two leaders met in the morning for 3 hours in the White House. During the afternoon, Kohl held more talks with Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and Treasury Secretary Donald Regan.

PRESS DISCUSSES LIFTING OF U.S. PIPELINE EMBARGO

DW151047 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 15 Nov 82

[From the Press Review]

[Text] The main topic today is the lifting of the American sanctions against the European-Soviet gas-pipeline deal.

The FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG writes in this connection: The lifting of the American sanctions against the natural gas-pipeline has a dual purpose. It is a goodwill gesture to visiting Chancellor Kohl as well as to the new leadership in the Kremlin. It was the intervention into the sovereignty of foreign countries which made it so difficult for the allies to accept this measure when it was imposed. This has been eliminated now, but it is doubtful whether the President will receive European concessions in return.

The daily, DIE WELT notes: It is not surprising that the German economy welcomes the lifting of American sanctions against the building of the Siberian pipeline. In the past few months, the economy has been in an unenviable position because it finds itself between the grindstones of different policies on this side of the Atlantic. Some good, however, has come out of the struggling in the Western alliance in the past months because there is now a clearer definition of a common and coordinated policy regarding trade with the East.

The STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG is of the following opinion: Ronald Reagan lost his fight long ago against the building of the European-Soviet pipeline. Now he has also had to give in to his European allies who were not prepared to pay for their participation in the project by making political concessions to the American President. Some 2-3 weeks ago no one expected him to give in that quickly. His retreat can be explained by the reverberations his negotiations with the Europeans were having in his own country. Reagan saw that he was becoming increasingly isolated.

The NUERNBERGER NACHRICHTEN stresses that the only question was how the White House chief could rescind the sanctions without losing face.

There were two basic possibilites: Either the rather ineffective boycott had to be replaced by something more effective, or Reagan would have to wait for the proper time when lifting the boycott would look like a conciliatory gesture to the Soviet Union. Officially, the President decided in favor of the first possibility by presenting the decision as a victory for the allies because more stringent trade policy, a new Western strategy toward the USSR has now been implemented. The agreements, from which France immediately disassoicated itself, in no way live up to this optimistic version.

The WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster states: Two things have helped the American President to save face while retreating. He was able to get the Western allies to aim for a more stringent trade policy toward the Soviet Union. It is indeed high time to examine to what extent the export of highly developed technology is advantageous to the Soviet arms industry to which the country's entire economy is tailored. In any event, it is difficult to understand why in particular, the East bloc states receive special loan conditions. In addition, Reagan's decision to lift the embargo was made considerably easier by recent developments in Moscow as well as in Warsaw. The President explicity stated that he also wants his step to be considered a signal for better relations with the Soviet Union.

The HANDELSBLATT of Duesseldorf notes: It is rather difficult to accept the U.S. President's justification for lifting the technology embargo against Europe in connection with the West European-Soviet natural gas pipeline with anything other than very mixed feelings. For months, the Reagan administration has built up a bogey with shifting justifications which, thank God, has hopefully diappeargd now. The justification for lifting the sanctions serves only to help the U.S. President save face in the United States. The quarrel itself -- as is shown by its origin, development and end -- was as unnecessary as a hole in the head. It must be hoped that the allies will now made a new beginning.

The HESSISCHE-NIEDERSAECHISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel emphasizes: The Kremlin could and should consider the lifting of the American sacntions as a sign of good will with which the American Government hopes to initiate an improvement of relations. This intention is stressed by the fact that the decison was made immediately after Brezhnev's death and Walesa's release. Reagan is offering a dialogue to the new people in power. The dark shadows which were cast on European-American relations by the embargo quarrel, have suddenly disappeared. Thus, the first White House visit by the new chancellor occurs under a lucky star.

CARSTENS, GENSCHER MEET WITH ANDROPOV IN USSR

[Text] Moscow, 15 Nov (DPA) -- Following Leonid Brezhnev's funeral, the new Soviet party chief had a 1-hour talk in Moscow on Monday with Federal President Karl Carstens and with Vice Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko was also present.

After the talk in the Kremlin, Genscher said that Andropov expressed his strong appreciation for the fact that "the Federal Republic wants to continue its present policy toward the Soviet Union." The official Soviet news agency, TASS, reported that both sides underlined their willingness to "develop mutually beneficial cooperation between the USSR and the FRG on the basis of the treaties and agreements concluded."

According to Genscher, all important East-West problems were discussed in the talk. Carstens said he was impressed by "the extent of Andropov's knowledge of the facts". The aide to the Soviet party chief, Andrey Aleksandrov, and the German ambassador in Moscow, Andreas Meyer-Landrut, were also present at the talk.

An earlier talk between Andropov and U.S. Vice President George Bush and Secretary of State George Shultz lasted 30 minutes.

GENSCHER ON TRADE AFTER SHULTZ USSR MEETING

[Excerpts] Bonn, 15 Nov (DPA) -- Following his talks with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher together with Western colleagues, underlined in Moscow on Monday the importance of trade relations as a stabilizing factor. At this meeting on the sidelines of the funeral ceremonies for Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev, which was also attended by the foreign ministers of Great Britain, France, Italy and Denmark, there was complete agreement on the political usefulness of Eastern trade, a foreign office spokesman said in Bonn on Monday. He refused to comment on France's position of disassociating itself from a new sharpened trade policy with the East, which U.S. President Ronald Reagan announced over the weekend in conjunction with the lifting of sanctions on the European-Soviet gas pipeline deal. Bonn still believed that a mutually agreed overall settlement is possible.

The Foreign Office spokesman confirmed that Shultz is to visit Bonn on 7 and 8 December. Shultz will be coming to Europe to attend the NATO autumn conference in Brussels.

GOVERNMENT WELCOMES RELEASE OF LECH WALESA

LD131222 Hamburg DPA in German 1149 GMT 13 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 13 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government has welcomed the release of the Polish workers' leader, Lech Walesa. This decision was a step in the right direction and is in line with the demand of the German lower house and the Western alliance, a government spokesman said on Saturday. Yet the release of Walesa fulfills only part of the demand. The government hopes, above all, that martial law will soon be lifted.

Vogel: Correct Reply Necessary

[Text] Bonn, 15 Nov (DPA) -- SPD chancellor candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel has welcomed the release of Polish trade union leader Lech Walesa and emphasized the hope that this first step will be followed by others. In a statement published in Bonn on Monday, Vogel added that even so, lifting Walesa's months-long internment has not solved the great problems of the country and of the Polish nation. The West, including the U.S. ally, must now make the right reply to this step. What must be borne in mind above all, is to consider what will and will not help the Polish people in overcoming its economic and political problems, Vogel stated.

GENSCHER ON COALITION, FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

DW151343 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 2030 GMT 13 Nov 82

[Interview with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher by reporter Kopp; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] The CSU wants you and your party to suffer parliamentary death on 6 March. Isn't this bound to confuse citizens and voters about the coalition?

[Answer] Certainly not about the Free Democrats because we don't participate in this type of discussion with our coalition partner. We hold the view that the citizens in our country expect the government to work, to make decisions and, above all, to effectively combat unemployment. The federal chancellor and I are fully aware of this. We both want it because we know that success for this government will also be success for all citizens in our country.

[Question] Are the liberals going to have to allow the coalition partner to decide on who will staff its ministries?

[Answer] I am not going to take part in a tug of war about positions or a rehash of the Strauss discussion.

[Question] Wouldn't the inclusion of Strauss in a new government be likely to stabilize the government and spare it trouble?

[Answer] I repeat, I am not going to take part in a rehash of the discussion on Strauss.

[Question] Doesn't the slogan "back to Adenauer" as used by Strauss mean a change in foreign policy?

[Answer] I said I will not discuss personnel questions. Regarding the matter itself, however, as foreign minister I am responsible for preventing German foreign policy from becoming unpredictable because of domestic policy reasons. I will do everything in my power to make sure that the continuity and predictability of our country's foreign and security policy cannot be called into question. This is in the interests of our country, and I am in agreement with the federal chancellor that the continuity of German foreign policy is important for our country, for cooperation in Europe and for our relationship with our Western partners as well as for our relationship with our neighbors in the East.

[Question] Won't the new Kremlin leaders, who are an unknown quantity in the area of foreign policy, need time to gain experience? Couldn't the Geneva schedule be upset?

[Answer] I think that a country like the Federal Republic, and not only us but all of the West, should contribute by a constantly continuing foreign and security policy course so as to prevent problems from arising for the East-West relationship as a result of the change in the Soviet Union. By the same token, we are relying on what the new Soviet leadership has said, namely, that the general foreign policy line will be continued. Therefore, it is important that the Federal Government as well as the American President have expressed our -- the West's -- interest in developing cooperation with the Soviet Union and its partners.

This is in the interests of people in the West and East and throughout the world, and we will continue to do everything in our power to help make the Geneva disarmament negotiations on medium-range missiles and intercontinental strategic missiles as well as the Madrid and Vienna negotiations a success. Disaramemnt is the great task for us in this decade, and it can be achieved only if both sides cooperate, if no side wants superiority and if both sides are willing to achieve a balance on the lowest possible level of weapons. We are prepared for this.

SCHNEIDER ON 'UNPREJUDICED DIALOGUE' WITH GDR

[Excerpt] Magdeburg, 15 Nov (DPA) -- FRG minister for regional and urban planning and construction, Oscar Schneider (CSU) has underlined the willingness of the new CDU/CSU Federal Government to have an "open and unprejudiced dialogue" with the GDR. At the opening of an FRG architecture exhibition in the GDR, Schneider said in Magdeburg on Monday that his visit was "a sign of the continuity of political relations between our states."

In the presence of GDR Construction Minister Wolfgang Junker, the Bonn politician said: "the GDR can rely on it that we shall honor all contractual obligations taken over, just as we, on our part, assume that the GDR will adhere to the spirit, meaning and purpose of the treaties concluded."

Schneider who is the first member of the Christian-liberal coalition to pay an official visit to the GDR, emphasized that the intention was "to contribute with all and every means to overcome misunderstandings, lessen tensions and arrive at good neighborly relations, to thus make a contribution toward safeguarding peace in Europe and the world." The Federal Government wanted to conduct German-German talks and cooperation "in all areas where this is possible and reasonable. In the interest of the peoples of the two states." As an important topic for talks, he mentioned environmental protection and cultural exchange. In this the GDR's willingness to resume negotiations on a cultural agreement, suspended a few years ago, (?would be) welcome.

Hans Fritsche, president of the Building Academy of the GDR, said that the exhbition, which had already been shown in East Berlin and Karl-Marx-Stadt, was meant to affirm the resolve "to maintain and if possible develop those positive matters in relations" between the GDR and Federal Republic achieved "through the policy of detente."

The opening of the exhibition at the Rotehorn cultural park was attended by Hans Otto Braeutigam, head of the FRG permanent mission in East Berlin, and Alfred Dick, Bavarian minister for regional development and environmental protection.

The federal minister pointed out that in connection with the basic treaty between the two German states, questions had remained unresolved and said: "We adhere to the unity of the German nation and recognize that there exist on German soil two states." The interest of the people for good relations is great, as shown also by the number of visitors to the "town park-park town" exhibition which in East Berlin and Karl-Marx-Stadt had reached nearly 140,000. Apart from the purely factual interest, the population on both sides expressed interest "to learn more about the German neighbor."

The CSU politician said: "We have a common national history" and mentioned the names of the poets Lessing, Geothe, and Hoelderlin. In this connection, he also mentioned the "son of Augsburg," Bert Brecht, who hitherto, on account of his communist commitments had been but little appreciated inside the CSU and had not been highly esteemed by the politicians of that party in Augsburg.

Schneider pointed out, among others, that the 150th anniversary of the death of Goethe will be celebrated this year and next will mark the 500th anniversary of the birth of the reformer Martin Luther. Irrespective of the different assessment of these figures, "we see them as representatives of the one German history, of our common cultural heritage," Schneider said.

Schneider said that he held an approximately 1-hour talk with GDR Minister Junker in an open and frank atmosphere. There was agreement on the exchange of a catalogue of subjects and questions concerning the area covered by their ministry, Schneider told journalists. He also pointed out that regarding environmental protection and air pollution problems, intensified contacts are necessary.

In reply to a question from Junker on counterarming, he said that the Federal Government is extremely interested in the success of the Soviet-American talks in Geneva on medium-range missiles in Europe. Concerning relations between the two German states, the minister said he was surprised at the scepticism shown toward the new Federal Government. It is a matter of course to try for a deepening of relations. The will has to be demonstrated "that we believe in a German nation" which is accommodated in two states. His visit is taking place on that basis.

REPORT ON GDR 'ACTS OF FORCE, UNLAWFULNESS'

[Text] Salzgitter, 15 Nov (DPA) -- The central office of the judicial authorities in Salzgitter for the registration of "acts of force and unlawfulness" on the part of the GDR, has noted a total of 28,044 "acts of force and abuse" by the GDR authorities in the 21 years since the central office was founded on 15 November 1961. This was reported on Monday by the head of the office, public prosecutor Carl Hermann Retemeyer.

In a total of 4,167 cases, use was made of firearms in the frontier regions bordering on the FRG and Berlin. According to Retemeyer, 188 people have died by the use of firearms, automatic firing devices and mines, 117 of them on the FRC/GDR frontier and 71 in the Berlin area.

The central office also registered 2,585 arrests in the frontier region, 18,823 convictions on political grounds, 1,872 cases of treating people as political suspects and 597 cases of maltreatment by officials.

COMMUNIQUE ON LIFTING OF PIPELINE SANCTIONS

[Communique issued by the French Ministry of External Relations on 13 November 1982]

[Text] France -- which informed its allies at the proper time about its position concerning "the conditions of trade between the East and the West" as proposed by the United States of America -- does not support the accord announced in Washington this afternoon. It has taken note of Mr Reagan's decision to lift the American embargo on supplies to the Soviet Union and particularly in connection with the European Siberian gas pipeline.

LE MONDE ON WORLD REACTION TO ANDROPOV ELECTION

[Editorial: "A Good Start"]

[Text] The prevailing feeling in the world on the announcement of Mr Andropov's appointment as CPSU chief seems to be that Leonid Brezhnev has been forgotten or, in any case, favorably replaced before being buried. The future will show whether that feeling is justified or whether it is merely an additional sign of the democracies' incorrigible optimism. Nonetheless, it leaves room for reasonable hope at least as much as for cowardly relief.

President Reagan's reaction is characteristic; although he is not "too surprised" by the Kremlin's choice, he scarcely concealed his satisfaction at this "rapid transition" made "in the interest of order." Following him, Mr Percy, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Commission, saw the fact that there has been no "prolonged power struggle" as "a good sign." That is going a little too quickly because this appointment does not end the power struggle, as all the precedents show. Nonetheless, the fact is that even the Soviet system's most implacable adversaries are afraid of seeing political instability introduced at the head of one of the biggest military powers in the world. Mr Reagan obviously hopes that the new Kremlin incumbent will have numerous problems, but not that one.

Even more significant is the rather favorable preconception which even the most skeptical and hostile people have of Mr Andropov. One U.S. official regards the new CPSU chief as "a man who is reputed to be intelligent and to have great experience" as well as "knowledge of foreign countries." Mr Percy sees him as a "tough negotiator" and an "energetic man" but none of that will make it impossible to have relations with him. Mr Reagan has no doubts about that either.

Other capitals are also wondering whether the "orderly transition" which has just taken place in Moscow does not justify a new approach to outstanding problems. That is probably true of Beijing — which had already started that development a long time ago and is sending the foreign minister to the Red Square funeral -- but also of Cairo; Mr Mubarak has just sent the Kremlin a particularly warm telegram and is sending a delegation to Moscow whereas the USSR had not been presented at President as-Sadat's funeral.

Nonetheless, none of what is being said in Moscow justified anticipating the future changes.

The proclamations made by the new leadership after Brezhnev's death and Mr Andropov's "acceptance speech" declare fidelity to the dead leader's options, as is natural, but maintain the "tough" tone adopted by the latter in his last speech (to the military) on 27 October. Thus, in Mr Andropov's view, peace cannot depend on "entreaties" and "can only be defended by means of the Soviet Armed Forces' indestructible might."

The new general secretary probably has to reassure his military, as his predecessor did. It is probably also true that the prolonged ultra-conservatism of the leadership over recent years makes any innovation seem like progress. But, although everything still has to be done, it is an initial success for Mr Andropov to be credited with a good start.

TRUDEAU CITED ON VISIT, FRENCH-SPEAKING SUMMIT

[Unattributed report: "Mr Trudeau Relaunches Plan for French-Speaking Countries' Summit."]

[Text] Mr Trudeau left Paris on the morning of Thursday, 11 November, at the end of a 3-day official visit to France. The Canadian prime minister is continuing his European tour in the FRG. Mr Trudeau was due to spend Thursday at the Canadian military base at Lahr, then to meet Friday with Mr Kohl and, privately, with Mr Schmidt, before returning to Canada Sunday.

"There is very great agreement in thinking (between Paris and Ottawa), even on the most complex problems, such as Poland, or the broadest, such as the North-South dialogue. Relations between the two countries are more than excellent," the Canadian prime minister stated during a press conference Wednesday. However, Mr Trudeau did not wish to enter into specific details of the economic cooperation projects between France and Canada raised throughout his visit. In fact, setting aside the announcement of the setting up of a Franco-Canadian committee of businessmen, headed by Mr Raymond Garneau, former finance minister in Mr Bourassa's government in Quebec, this visit has led to no immediate result at the economic level.

Wednesday, Mr Trudeau visited the Paris headquarters of the Cultural and Technical Cooperation Agency, which comprises most of the French-speaking countries. The Canadian prime minister took advantage of it to relaunch the idea of a French-speaking countries' summit, formerly proposed by Mr Senghor. "It is no use our bringing together our artists, technicians, academics and scientists: until we have held a summit of the French-speaking countries' political leaders, our plan for a real international French-speaking area will remain incomplete," Mr Trudeau said in particular.

SAUDI FOREIGN MINISTER JOINS ARAB COMMITTEE

LD152205 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 2112 GMT 15 Nov 82

[Text] Riyadh, 15 Nov (SPA) -- Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal arrived in Paris tonight to join the seven-man Arab committee set up by the Fes summit and led by Jordan's King Husayn.

The delegation is scheduled to begin its talks with French officials tomorrow with a meeting with President Francois Mitterrand and Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson.

RIFT OVER SALE TO SOUTH AFRICA OF NUCLEAR PLANT

[Text] Paris, Nov 15 (AFP) -- A plan to sell a second French nuclear power station to South Africa has split the government here and threatens to wreck France's credibility in Black Africa, the left-wing daily LIBERATION reported today.

The paper said that the plan was being backed by Industry and Research Minister Jean-Pierre Chevenement, who sees advantages in the 4,000 jobs the programme would provide, and strongly opposed by External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson and Foreign Aid Minister Jean-Pierre Cot.

Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert and Finance Minister Jacques Delors are said to be unaffected by political or moral issues, but are worried about an operation which would tie France to South Africa financially for well into the next century. LIBERATION said the final decision would probably be up to President Francois Mitterrand early next year. He is reported to be generally against the deal.

South Africa's first nuclear power station, at Koeberg near Capetown, is expected to start operating soon. The signature of the multi-million dollar contract in 1976 attracted much hostility from Black African states, but Mr Mitterrand's Socialist administration decided to honour the agreement when it came to power 18 months ago. Against protests from anti-apartheid groups, the government allowed the shipping of a reactor vessel and the supply of fuel to Koeberg.

LIBERATION quoted a Socialist Party spokesman as saying that France's southern African policy must be in line with party leader Lionel Jospin's statements to a United Nations conference on sanctions against South Africa held in Paris last year. Mr Jospin said then that there should be a "disengagement" from South Africa, and all investments by French nationalised companies there should be halted.

There was no immediate comment from the French Government on today's LIBERATION report.

CYNICISM NEEDED IN APPROACHING MADRID FORUM

[Editorial: "Human Rights and Freedoms in Madrid...."]

[Text] The unreality of the exercise which the representatives of the 35 East and West European and North American Governments are resuming in Madrid this Tuesday, 9 November will spark off a great deal of sarcasm. It requires a large dose of unawareness or cynicism to aspire to seriously discuss respect for human rights, "confidence-building measures" and disarmament from the Atlantic to the Urals, when Mr Brezhnev is again using cold war language, when the Red Army's battle against the Afghan resistance is dragging on, when the military dictatorship in Poland is becoming more oppressive, when nuclear modernization programs are in full swing and when Anatoliy Shcharanskiy -- one well-known name among many unknown people -- guilty only of demanding that his government honor its Helsinki Act pledges, is rotting in Soviet prisons.

The signatories of a good conduct code in all spheres -- political, military, economic, cultural, humanitarian -- for the whole of Europe in the Finnish capital on 1 August 1975, had pledged to monitor its implementation. That was the subject of a second CSCE conference in Belgrade which ended in 1978 without any tangible results. The third, which began in Madrid 2 years ago and which resumes this Tuesday after an 8-month break, has taken the same course.

The accusation of excessive naivety often leveled at the Western signatories of the Helsinki Act is not fair. Can they be accused of dropping the substance for the shadow by accepting the "territorial status quo" in Europe in exchange for an illusory pledge by the Kremlin to respect human rights? To say that, is to forget that the Western countries did not have the substance....

In exchange, the Western countries obtained, with relatively precise pledges, the USSR's recognition that "respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is an essential element of peace." That is a political trump card which has probably affected Soviet dissidence and a diplomatic trump card which is futile only if it is not used. It would perhaps have been wiser for the Western countries to concentrate their action on this point. However, at the beginning of the Madrid conference, they proposed, at France's instigation, a conference on disarmament in Europe [CDE]. The intention was not bad, since the aim was to strip the Soviets of the monopoly of verbal disarmament. Moreover, Mr Brezhnev seemed to be interested in the CDE and rather created a sensation by agreeing that "confidence-building measures" should extend to the Urals while demanding something in exchange, which is yet to be specified, on the Atlantic side.

But is this not all just to keep the company amused since such a conference has no chance of succeeding? That is certainly the Americans' opinion and they want to return to the essential point: priority to human rights, especially in Poland.

A veiled argument has arisen between the Europeans and Americans on the tactics to be followed, the former pointing out to the latter that there is no more reason to abandon the CDE plan than the U.S.-Soviet nuclear talks. If discussions among Western countries superseded the East-West debate in Madrid, the Soviets would have won a clear victory in advance.

SENATOR CLAIMS ANTIAIRCRAFT DEFENSES INADEQUATE

[Unattributed report: "Senator's Report Says Army's Antiaircraft Protection Clearly Inadequate"]

[Text] "The French Army's antiaircraft defense is evidently inadequate," Rally for the Republic [RPR] Senator for Sarthe Jacques Chaumont says in a report whose publication was approved unanimously by the Senate Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee. "The air threat is too often underestimated, both quantitatively and qualitatively," is the conclusion of the report's author, who was authorized to visit several surface-to-air artillery regiments.

Analyzing the numbers of aircraft available to the Warsaw Pact armed forces, Mr Chaumont for the first time lists the range of ground-attack aircraft and helicopters which, according to the report, would be used against France "in the event of a global action against the whole of Western Europe."

According to the senator's report, "from the moment of engagement, France would have to cope with the threat of a minimum of 400 attack aircraft directed against its forces."

Altogether, Mr Chaumont adds, "though the French forces are situated behind the forces of NATO member states, it can be assumed that in the event of an aggression a single army corps can fear 400-1,000 enemy air sorties, at the rate of 50-100 missions of 8-24 aircraft a day. These missions would be all the more dangerous being combined with a radar penetration system, which seems to be at an advanced stage. For every three attacking aircraft, there would be a jamming aircraft and one equipped with countermeasure devices operating, as far as possible, outside the range of ground-to-air defense systems."

Apart from this threat, Mr Chaumont says one should add a further threat to the French forces stemming from the recent entry into service in the Warsaw Pact of powerful armored and heavily armed attack helicopters.

"In an engagement," the report states, "experts in general believe that the French land forces alone could be confronted with some 250 battle helicopters.... The helicopter would specialize in direct fire support and would operate against armored units, troop concentrations, forward command posts and forward surface-to-air defenses. The helicopters would be used in formations of 8-20. The new generations of Soviet all-weather, hedge-hopping antitank helicopters, strongly protected against small-caliber weapons and some kinds of surface-to-air missiles, constitute formidable firing platforms" due to their mobility and variety of armaments.

Missile Battery

Next, Mr Chaumont reviewed the French surface-to-air artillery equipment for countering such a threat.

The Army's medium-range (50-20,000 meters altitude to a distance of 40 km) antiaircraft protection is provided by batteries of Hawk missiles, whose cost is excessive, mobility weak and numbers inadequate (a single Hawk regiment for each army corps). Short-range protection (20-3,000 meters altitude to a distance of 6 km) is provided by batteries of Roland missiles which are ill-suited for combating helicopters, whose all-weather version has just entered service, and deliveries of which will not be complete (because of the 200 destined for the battle corps) until 1986, according to present estimates.

With regard to very short range defenses (up to about 2,500 meters), which is provided by 40mm or 30mm guns, "their replacement by more modern guns is necessary as soon as possible," the RPR's senator for Sarthe observes.

The majority of these weapons, particularly the Hawk and Roland missiles and the twin 30mm gun, are directly under the orders of the army corps. "Divisions have no surface-to-air artillery weapons of their own," Mr Chaumont points out, "and the total absence of antiaircraft weapons at the divisional level constitutes a serious shortcoming in this pattern" of organization of the Army, within which the division is the basic unit of the French military. "For several years of high risk," the report concludes, "the Army will be inadequately equipped with the surface-to-air defense systems essential for its protection."

STATEMENT FROM COMMUNIQUE ON EXTRADITION POLICY

[Excerpt from the communique issued following the Council of Ministers' meeting of 10 November 1982, place of issuance not stated]

[Text] The Council of Ministers heard a statement from the keeper of the seals, minister of justice, on the rules for applying French legislation on extradition. The right of asylum belongs to France's republican and democratic tradition. It contributes greatly to France's influence in the world. It is based on principles and texts which can in no circumstances be called in question:

1. -- the preamble to the 1946 Constitution, confirmed by the 1958 Constitution.
2. -- the international conventions to which France is party, particularly that of Geneva in 1951 on refugees.
3. -- The 1927 Act which lays down the rules for extradition and gives the judicial authorities the task of exercising their duty of "guardian of individual freedom" granted to them under Article 66 of the Constitution.

Because of these considerations, the government will continue to refuse to extradite persons benefiting from political asylum in France when this is demanded for the reasons for which this asylum was granted.

With this in mind, requests for extradition will be assessed on the basis of four criteria, each of which may provide the grounds for refusing to extradite:
-- Nature of the applicant states's political and judicial system.
-- political nature of the offense for which the extradition is requested.
-- political motive of the extradition request.
-- risk of worsening, in the case of extradition, the situation of the person concerned, because, in particular, of his political action or opinions, race or religion.

However, and having regard to the preceding observations, the political nature of the offense will not be accepted and the extradition will in principle be granted, subject to the advice of the public prosecutor's office, when criminal acts have been committed in a state which respects fundamental freedoms and rights (hostage-taking, murder, violence resulting in serious injury or death, etc.) such that the alleged political purpose could not justify the use of unacceptable means.

The government has decided to apply these principles to any future extradition requests submitted to it. These rules, applicable from now on will have no retrospective effect.

PS, PCF DISCUSS 1983 COMMUNE ELECTIONS

[Apparent text of joint statement issued after PS-PCF meeting on 10 November on forthcoming commune elections]

[Text] The delegations adopted the following joint statement: The March 1983 commune elections will be an important point in our country's democratic life.

Thanks to the left, minorities will henceforth be present on the municipal councils and, through decentralization, the responsibilities of municipal councils and mayors have been expanded.

Those who have introduced these reforms are best qualified to implement them: By giving the leftwing forces responsibility for many communes, the citizens will give even greater resources to democracy in this country, especially sicne the Left's record in the communes is undoubtedly regarded as positive.

The right's only program is to seek revenge, to call into question the major reforms now being accomplished by the new majority. That aspiration will be thwarted. To accomplish this all the people's forces and all the forces of change must unite.

At the end of their new meeting on 10 November, the PS and PCF delegations headed by [PS First Secretary] Lionel Jospin and [PCF Secretary General] Georges Marchais noted that discussions have begun in cities and departments. They must be continued in a united atmosphere, with the will to succeed in all cases.

In order to encourage the conclusion of these agreements as soon as possible, the two delegations decided to set up a joint working group between the two parties at a national level. That working group will meet next week.

PCF LEADERSHIP SENDS ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE TO CPSU

PM150943 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 8 Nov 82 p 7

["Text" of French Communist Party (PCF) Central Committee Secretariat letter to CPSU Central Committee: "Socialism Has Become Reality Under Construction;" first paragraph L'HUMANITE introduction]

[Text] On the 65th anniversary of the October Revolution, the French Communist Party [PCF] Central Committee Secretariat sent the CPSU Central Committee a letter, whose full text is as follows:

Dear comrades, on the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the October Revolution, we send our fraternal and warm greetings to the CPSU and the Soviet people.

The October 1917 Revolution was the first socialist revolution to emerge. A great hope was born within all oppressed peoples.

For imperialism, it marked the end of its absolute rule and the beginning of the change in the international balance of forces. For the first time in the world, men and women freed themselves from man's exploitation by man. Utopia came to an end and socialism became a reality under construction.

The Soviet people undertook a process of radical transformation of their living conditions, of their entire society. Along this path, difficulties and problems connected with the Czarist heritage and international pressures occurred and tragic errors were also committed.

Now, 65 years after the October Revolution, substantial results have been achieved by the Soviet people, as shown by the 26th CPSU Congress. Major progress in the economic, social, technological and cultural fields has been achieved. At the same time, new problems connected with the development of socialist soceity are emerging.

We follow with interest the research, the innovations and the new answers that you contribute so as to ensure the increasingly better satisfaction of the population's growing needs and to strengthen people's active participation. We devote particular attention to them inasmuch as experiences confirm that the development of socialism requires the increasingly advanced democratization of economic, social and political life.

Your 26th congress forcefully reasserted your constant efforts to implement a policy of peace and disarmament. This is the direction in which your subsequent proposals were aimed.

As you know, our party believes that peace and disarmament are one of the peoples' essential aspirations and that nothing must be neglected in responding to it.

This was the significance of the proposals that the PCF submitted to the special-session-of the United Nations.

Other states and various political forces have also expressed ideas for moving in the direction of disarmament.

These must all be carefully and seriously examined and discussed, and we believe that as long as the independence and security of every state and every people is taken into account, it will be possible and desirable to positively reach specific measures that will make it possible to progress in the direction of disarmament and detente.

Now, as the world evolves, socialism is becoming increasingly diversified. It is the task of peoples with very different histories and very specific traditions.

It is an irreplaceable contribution to mankind's progress. This increasing diversity confirms our belief that there can be no model of socialism for export or import.

At our 24th congress, following the 22d and 23d, the French Communists formed their own blueprint for socialism and a democratic path for reaching it. Thus, we propose to our people to build a democratic and self-managed socialism based on our country's real needs and our people's history, aspirations and tastes -- a thoroughly French-style socialist society.

At the same time, in view of imperialism's growing aggressiveness, we are working to rally all the forces throughout the world that proclaim themselves for peace and disarmament, for social justice and for democracy.

It is this solidarity with everything that is advancing throughout the world that we call new internationalism. In this action the communist parties' solidarity, based on a conception of interparty relations adapted to our era, is indispensable.

Following the January 1980 meeting between our parties, fruitful cooperation, on these clear foundations, has developed for our joint objectives, particularly those of peace, social progress and socialism, and we intend to continue it.

French-Soviet cooperation has been marked this year by the exceptional event constituted the joint space flight.

This demonstrates the opportunities that exist for a greater and mutually advantageous development of cooperation in the economic, political, cultural and scientific fields between our countries. It constitutes an important factor of peace.

Dear comrades, we send our fraternal greetings and sincere good wishes of success to the CPSU Central Committee and to the entire Soviet people.

[Signed] The PCF Central Committee Secretariat

PCF LEADERSHIP DISCUSSES BOOSTING PARTY WORK

[Apparent text of PCF Central Committee 9 November resolution]

[Text] The members of the PCF Central Committee and Federation first secretaries approved at a 8-9 November 1982 meeting, the report on the development and amplification of party work within the enterprises, presented by Jean-Claude Gayssot.

The 24th Congress in fact stressed that "the enterprises are our first field of battle" and drew the entire party's attention to the need to pay much more heed to communist organizations' life and activity where "the fundamental confrontation of our time sets the people against capital."

The evolution of science and technology, the intensification of the political and ideological struggle and the exacerbation of the class struggle make the enterprise a place in which the most important changes are taking place, both in forms of conduct and in the professional field or enterprises' social composition.

The implementation of our strategy, based on our desire to create a French path to socialism, for a democratic and self-managed form of socialism, demands more consistent and fruitful communist activity in many more factories, offices, laboratories and work places to make them living sources of democracy and of workers' intervention in management, in their own interests and those of the nation.

The National Council of French Employers, in close association with the Chiracs, d'Estaings, Barres and others, opposes any advance in the direction of the will expressed by the majority of our people. This stance reveals the extent of the political and ideological battle within the enterprise and what is at stake there. It strengthens the communists' role and responsibility.

The national activity in which the Communist Party is involved for economic reform, jobs, social progress and the workers' new rights and reparations for the municipal elections require major party activity within the enterprises.

The members of the Central Committee and federation first secretaries call on all party organizations -- federal committees, section committees and cells -- to carry out a serious and in-depth discussion of the Central Committee's proceedings and to take the necessary specific action decisions. To this end Jean-Claude Gayssot's report will be published in a booklet for every communist.

They decided to give sections and cells the help they need so that communists, whatever their responsibilities, can understand the importance of the effort requested of them. This effort must take the form of the organization of the support of thousands of men and women, blue-collar and white-collar workers, specialized personnel, qualified engineers and cadres for the PCF; an improvement of political activity by factory cells; increased ideological, educational and propaganda work; and particularly a much greater effort to distribute the communist press, the publication of enterprise newspapers and the organization of collections for the national subscription.

Following this Central Committee meeting, communists will devote themselves to implementing the following guideline of the 24th Congress: "waging the battle within the enterprise and winning it. This must be the entire party's number one objective."

NORDIC PAPERS VIEW U.S. MIDTERM ELECTION RESULTS

PM151617 [Editorial Report] Nordic newspapers of 4 and 7 November carry commentary on the outcome of the U.S. midterm elections.

All stress the election's inconclusive outcome and the difficulty of making long-term predictions from it, but see encouragement for U.S. Democrats and a warning to President Reagan about the future course of his policies. Stockholm's SVENSKA DAGBLADET of 4 November in its page 2 editorial writes: "Tuesday's U.S. congressional elections were a clear, but by no means overwhelming victory for the Democratic Party. In the House of Representatives, where they already had a majority, the Democrats won more new seats than the majority of observers had expected. However, in the Senate they were unable to upset the Republcians' majority."

Oslo's ARBEIDERBLADET of 4 November examines the significance of the Democrats' gains in its page 4 editorial. "True enough, the Democrats can book a sort of psychological victory, which will be important not least of all because of the presidential election in 2 years' time, while in the meantime, they hope to have paralyzed the politically conservative majority that has existed in the House of Representatives despite the Democrats' nominal domination. A coalition between the Republicans and around 50 conservative Democrats, the so-called boll weevils, have hitherto assured a majority for Reagan's economic policies in the "Democratic" House of Representatives. Tuesday's election means that Reagan will now have serious problems in his relations with the legislators. In our view, this is the most encouraging result of this election."

Oslo's AFTENPOSTEN of 4 November concentrates in its page 2 editorial on the election's message to President Reagan: "Reagan made the slogan 'stay the course' his main thrust in the election this fall. The support he has received is so qualified that the figures can be read as a serious warning to the Republican Party in the runup to the 1984 presidential election. If by that time there has been no economic upturn, so that it is possible to make satisfactory comparisons between election promises and reality, the major victory in 1980 will pass into history as an intermezzo. It is results which count and 10 million unemployed will be a result which the Republican will not be able to stand when the voters go to the polls in 2 years' time."

Copenhagen's AKTUELT of 7 November follows the same line of argument: "both the Republicans and Democrats say that they have won the U.S. midterm election. To a certain extent, they are both right. The Democrats won 26 seats in the House of Representatives and in doing so weakened Reagan's position, but on the other hand the Democratic successes were smaller than expected. Reagan takes the outcomes as a half victory, because it is normal for a U.S. President to suffer setbacks in midterm elections.

"Reagan's losses are especially pleasing for two reasons. For one thing he will now be forced to spend fewer billions on defense, and for another cuts in social spending will now be smaller. Reagan has plans to run for reelection in 1984. If he does not change his policies before then and does not halt the rapidly rising level of unemployment, he will have no chance of being reelected."

Helsinki's Swedish-language HUFVUDSTADSBLADET concludes its page 4 Rafael Paro editorial by devoting some attention to the nuclear arms freeze referendums held in conjunction with the election: "In a states and around 30 cities the voters were also given an opportunity to air their views on a nuclear arms freeze in both the Soviet Union and the United States.

"According to the available reports, the freeze proposal has generally won a clear majority. The referendum results do not bind the President, but they must be seen as an important indication of popular opinion. The President is opposed to the freeze movement because in his view a freeze would reduce the Soviet Union's interest in serious disarmament negotiations. This summer the House of Representatives rejected a proposal for an arms freeze by a slim majority.

"One of the most interesting questions raised by the election result is: Does Reagan intend to run for a second 4 years in office? Presumably the present setback was not strong enough to deter him, although he had been forced to admit that the thrust of the conservative trend in the United States has been broken."

TASS COMMENTARY ON MBFR NEGATES STAAR'S OPTIMISM

PM150939 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 29 Oct 82 p 8

[Unattributed dispatch: "Soviet 'No' to MBFR Proposals"]

[Text] Moscow, 28 Oct -- The Soviet news agency TASS completely rejected on Thursday, the Western nations' proposals for troop reductions in central Europe which were put forward during the so-called MBFR talks in Vienna this summer.

In a commentary, TASS wrote that the proposal from the Western nations is one-sided and reflects NATO's attempts to win one-sided military advantages for the alliance. "The proposal is in all respects a repetition of the proposal for monitoring arrangements put forward by the Western nations in 1979. In addition, they also want some of these arrangements to cover not only central Europe, but also Eastern Europe and large parts of the European Soviet Union," TASS wrote. "The demarche from NATO is one-sided and rules out the possibility of an agreement," TASS claimed.

The TASS commentary is seen as a direct response to statements made by U.S. Chief Negotiator Richard Staar in Helsinki recently. He expressed great optimism and said that it would not be impossible for the two sides to reach an initial agreement this spring.

PARTY LEADERS COMMENT ON BREZHNEV DEATH

[Unattributed report: "Reaction To Brezhnev's Death"]

[Excerpt] Labor Party Chairman Gro Harlem Brundtland: "There is little reason to believe that President Brezhnev's death will mean any great changes in Soviet policy. However, the Soviet Union is today facing a number of problems, economic and political. The international situation is tense and it is important for us all that the change of leadership in the Kremlin should not lead to uncertainty and deadlock."

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch: "Under Brezhnev's leadership the Soviet Union has strengthened its position as a world power. During his period of power broader contacts were developed with Western nations, at the same time as arms control and disarmament negotiations were begun. His name will probably also be linked with the events of recent years in Afghanistan and Poland."

Kare Kristiansen, Christian People's Party: "Brezhnev's death could mean the end of an era in the Soviet Union, even though it is unlikely that it will have any immediate consequences. He will be remembered as a solid and faithful servant of the Soviet Union and the party, but he will not go down in history as a leader of the Stalin format."

THATCHER ON RELATIONS WITH NEW SOVIET LEADERSHIP

[By Andy Webb, PA Political Staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher tonight combined a toughly-worded denunciation of Soviet Communism with a willingness to work with the new Moscow leadership if it makes concessions on human rights and disarmament.

She also welcomed the release from detention of Mr Lech Walesa, whom she described as a "brave Polish patriot". But she added: "We must wait to see whether it will be accompanied by other measures to meet the aspirations of the Polish people."

Speaking at the lord mayor's banquet at London's Guildhall on the day of President Brezhnev's funderal, Mrs Thatcher said East-West relations had entered a new period of uncertainty. "At such a moment, others look to Britain as a source of stability and continuity," she said.

"In the weeks and months ahead we shall watch the new Soviet leadership earnestly for solid evidence of a willingness to work for genuine multilateral disarmament. Any such evidence will be met with a ready welcome and quick response from us. We shall also be looking for signs for a greater respect for human rights and international law than we have seen in recent years and we shall be equally ready to respond to that."

But Mrs Thatcher added grimly: "I cannot forget that over the past years where the Soviet Union has advanced, it has done so not by the force of ideas, but by force pure and simple. I cannot forget that in Afghanistan and Cambodia, Soviet Communism is engaged not in wars of liberation, but wars of conquest. I cannot forget that in Poland, an alien creed was imposed on a people from outside. But the spirits of resistance in that brave people is such that not even martial law, inspired and sustained from Moscow, can weaken their pride or extinguish their hopes."

Pointing to the "remorseless increase" in Soviet military strength, Mrs Thatcher said: "We must maintain our defences. They guarantee our freedom. And our resolve to defend our way of life is a sign of hope to the oppressed that one day they may be free."

Mrs Thatcher admitted there had been a strain in relations with America, but said such difficulties had to be seen in perspective. The alliance had an underlying strength based on a commitment to defend common values. She also warned Britain's trading partners about the threat to free trade. "Those countries who pay lip service to the ideal, but who, by one strategem or another protect their own markets, must realise we are under pressure to retaliate."

The theme of Mrs Thatcher's speech was illusion and reality. She said one such illusion had been that Soviet ambitions could be contained by wishful thinking about detente. But there were other illusions in the 1970's -- that rising prosperity was guaranteed and would be provided by someone else and that we could defend our vital interests but cut defence spending. "Those days are over. There is a healthy new realism across the country. We have learned not to run away from difficult choices," said the prime minister. "There is a growing recognition that inflation can and must be defeated, and defeated for good." She concluded: "We shall face the challenge of the 80's and 90's not with illusions, not with doubts, but with realism and determination, with the will to take risks, the will to overcome the obstacles and the will to succeed."

TELEGRAPH: BREZHNEV NO DOVE, ANDROPOV NEITHER

PM160853 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 14 Nov 82 p 19

[Editorial: "No Time To Be Gullible"]

[Text] The change of guard at the Kremlin has provoked some remarkably naive assessments in the West, both as concerns the dead leader and his successors. President Brezhnev has been widely hailed, and not simply by left-wing commentators, as the architect of detente, almost as though he had been the dove of peace in human form. The Helsinki accords, his main diplomatic achievement, are cited as evidence of this. What Brezhnev in fact achieved at that world summit was the formal acceptance by the Western powers of the vast East European empire which the Red Army occupied and brutally subjugated in the wake of Hitler's war. What Brezhnev promised in return -- a freer flow of culture and communications between East and West -- the Soviet Union has signally failed to deliver. This is detente, Soviet style.

So is that other major contribution which Brezhnev made to European "stability": the famous Brezhnev doctrine which, in effect, declared that it was always right and proper to maintain by brute force the foreign communist regimes which the Russians had established by brute force. The year 1968 saw the first clinical application of this doctrine in Czechoslovakia; eleven years later came a more messy application in Afghanistan. All the while under Brezhnev the Soviet Union, through the stupendous expansion of its Navy, was converting itself from being a continental land threat to one which could menance countries all around the world.

There is precious little that is peace-loving about all this except, of course, that Brezhnev loved to get away with it all in peace. An almost equal gullibility has, too often, greeted the elevation of the former head of the KGB, Yuriy Andropov. To suggest that, as the withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Austria followed Stalin's death, so now a Red Army withdrawal from Afghanistan may follow that of Brezhnev, is to draw a sorry parallel indeed. After 1953 the Kremlin craved for an end of terror at home and a new image abroad. The impetus was all for change. Now it is all for continuity and consolidation, and is likely to remain so as long as Andropov, the nominee of the Red Army marshals, stays at the top. The militant note of his first utterances, basing Soviet policy on "the invincible might of the Soviet Armed Forces," marks his debt to his sponsors clearly enough.

We do well to remember what, strictly speaking, a change of guard really means: A new sentry takes over; his function is the same.

TELEGRAPH CITES CONTINUING U.S.-EEC DIFFERENCES

[Editorial: "The Pipeline and After"]

[Text] President Reagan's decision to lift American sanctions on companies supplying equipment for the Soviet gas pipeline removes a clear threat to several thousand jobs in Europe and puts an end to one of the most rancorous transatlantic disputes in recent years.

If the Americans handled the issue badly, especially in imposing a retroactive embargo on deliveries already under contract, it cannot be said that the European countries always acted with full understanding of the political consequences of such a deal. Now the Europeans (with a question-mark over France) are to consider how they ought to strengthen controls on the supply of strategic goods and monitor fresh financial credits for Moscow. That may be less than the United States originally hoped for from their European allies but President Reagan will no doubt feel that it nevertheless serves his point well enough. It is now frankly doubtful that the financing or technology for a second such deal are likely in the present state of East-West relations.

Following on last month's settlement of the steel war between the European Community and America, it is now tempting to speculate that the wretched deterioration in relations between the two sides of the Atlantic in the past year is ending. But there is little evidence to suggest that agreement happened because of any sudden input of political goodwill. Even sterner tests have still to be faced.

The most conspicuous -- and potentially by far the most dangerous -- test is over international trade and it will move into the forefront when ministers from more than 80 countries meet for talks on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in Geneva next week to set the broad pattern for the world's trading system for the rest of the 1980's. Already the meeting is shaping up as a collision of principle between the Americans, anxious in theory at least to pare down national trade safeguards, and the European Community which is far more concerned to keep what protection already exists.

These differences are keenest over agriculture and it will frankly take a small miracle to devise language acceptable to both sides that goes beyond banalities. To the EEC, agriculture is simply not a matter for GATT regulation and ministers of the Ten have already stripped their representatives in Geneva of any authority to negotiate on the issue. Yet a blunt refusal of United States demands risks awakening the slumbering giant of American farm protectionism and provoking a transatlantic agriculture war of dismaying proportions.

Unfortunately for the Community, moreover, its attitude is not internally consistent. While on the one hand it rejects American claims that its farm export subsidies have given it an unfair edge in world markets (at the same time depressing prices to the detriment of United States farmers), on the other it wants to end the unrestricted flow of cheap American "cereal substitutes" and soya which undercut European wheat producers. As in so many other aspects of Community life, one is tempted to comment that the common agricultural policy has a great deal to answer for.

KIPRIANOU, PAPAIOANNOU RETURN FROM MOSCOW

[Text] President Kiprianou, who represented Cyprus at Leonid Brezhnev's funeral, returned this evening. He was received at Larnaca Airport by House of Representatives President Ladhas, who replaced him during his absence; members of the Council of Ministers; the dean of the diplomatic corps Soviet Ambassador Astavin; the chiefs of the National Guard and police, and other officials. AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou, who also attended the funeral, also returned from Moscow.

Since last May, the talks had been going on twice a week, on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

TURKISH MAP OF OCCUPIED TERRITORY PROTESTED

[Text] The government of the republic has made representations to the International Maritime Organization regarding the circulation of a map on "search and rescue" operations by Turkey depicting Cyprus' occupied territory and its sea under Turkish operational control. After the representations, the International Maritime Organization circulated a document of protest and a map of Cyprus depicting the area in which Cyprus can respond to the demands of the international agreement for sea search and rescue operations. This area includes both Cyprus' territorial waters as well as some areas outside them. Turkey had circulated the map during the 27th session of the Subcommittee for Search and Rescue at Sea.

The republic's Foreign Ministry, in cooperation with the Communications Ministry, immediately gave instructions to the republic's high commissioner in Britain to make representations to the secretary general of the International Maritime Organization and to ask it to circulate to all its members a document of protest and a pertinent map.

O AGON CHALLENGES KIPRIANOU TO ACT FOR UNITY

[From the "My Opinion" column, by "The Observer"]

[Text] What are the basic weapons and main prerequisites for the successful waging of the Cypriot struggle?

-- They are, first, unity among the people, prevalence of a mild political climate, control of passions and the existence of a joint line on the national issue;
-- And, second, absolute and sincere cooperation between the Governments of Greece and Cyprus and their alignment on a joint policy for promotion of the Cyprus issue.

No objective and logical man could argue today that these two basic prerequisites exist in order to assist an effective waging of our struggle.

Our domestic front is fragmented; the people are divided; passion dominates; everyone has his own policy on the national issue; there is no sincere cooperation with Greece and the joint line with Athens has become a dream.

Who is responsible for this state of affairs? We have stated and proved with facts and specific examples that the main responsibility for the wretched spectacle presented by the domestic front as well as by the Greece-Cyprus front today rests with President Kiprianou. Kiprianou took over from Makarios a united front, a joint line on the national issue. He rose to the presidency with the help of all the political leaders, even those who are described as "suitors of authority." He inherited a democratic cooperation which in the 1976 parliamentary election triumphed with a 73 percent majority.

Prospects were hopeful and encouraging, but today Kiprianou has turned them into dark and murky ones:

— He dissolved the nonpartisan Makarios government and formed a democratic party government.
-- He forced Kliridhis to withdraw from the National Council.
— He fired Papadhopoulos from the position of interlocutor.
-- He broke up his own party, forcing A. Mikhailidhis and other leading personalities to abandon it.
— He elevated Sofianos to seventh heaven only to fire him at midnight.
— He abandoned the Makarios line.
-- He abolished the National Council, which represented the collective spirit and unity of political leadership.
— He degraded the role of parties, leaving political leaders uninformed and forced to glean information through the press.
-- He clashed with the archbishop.
-- He disagreed with Lissaridhis.
— He has seen 73 percent which the Democratic Cooperation Front received in 1976 diminished to 52 percent today.
-- He has governed for 5 years and his party, although it is the government party, did not manage to receive more than 19 percent [of the votes].
-- He clashed with AKEL and was named by that party as the only one responsible for the breakup.
— He later reached a compromise once again with the left and agreed with it on the well known minimum program in exchange for his guaranteed nomination as the presidential candidate of the Democratic Cooperation Front.
— He promoted a joint line with AKEL based upon AKEL's line instead of a joint line among all.
— He delivered the death blow to the unity of the people and Greece-Cyprus cooperation by opposing the Papandreou line and by tolerating AKEL's insults against the Greek prime minister.

We do not need to cite more examples and proof. For the time being these suffice. The government spokesman, however, insists on silence. We mentioned dozens of instances of Kiprianou's disruption of unity and unanimity but he did not mention even one single instance of promotion of unity by the president, who by nature and position ought to be the symbol and the pole of attraction instead of being the cause for dispersal. Speaking vaguely, the government spokesman said, "Kiprianou made, and continues to make, consistent efforts for unity and cooperation...." He fails to understand one thing: No longer are the people satisfied or convinced by empty verbiage. The people want deeds, they demand proof and facts. What "consistent efforts" -- we once again ask the spokesman -- did Kiprianou make for unity and cooperation? We demand an answer, a specific and clear answer without evasions.

Even now, there are still possibilities for President Kiprianou to act correctly and rebuild what his policy ruined.

We call upon the government spokesman to tell us:

1. Is Kiprianou prepared to state that he disassociates himself from the minimum program with only one party and that he will invite all political leaders to the National Council in order to lay down a joint line on the Cyprus issue?
2. Is Kiprianou prepared to align himself with the line of the Greek Government on the national issue?
3. Is Kiprianou prepared to undertake initiatives to restore his relations with the other political leaders?
4. Is Kiprianou prepared to resurrect the National Council and to restore the authority of the institution as an organ for collective handling of the national issue and as representative of unity among the political leadership?

We expect an answer and the government spokesman should have no doubts that in the eventuality that Kiprianou proceeds with these important gestures — imperative toward establishment of a healthy and universal unity — then O AGON and "The Observer" will have no reservations or hesitation in supporting the president and will oppose any one political leader who fails to respond to such salvation gestures.

PAPER REPORTS NARCOTICS TRAFFICKING IN NORTH

[Text] The Turkish settlers have converted the occupied areas into a narcotics plantation. Along with this, they have installed a number of modern workshops for the processing of hashish. Hundreds of tons of "white death" material are being conveyed to Europe from these workshops.

Diplomats, who visit the occupied areas, have noticed such workshops as well as offices which serve as headquarters for the Turkish narcotics smugglers, and have submitted relevant reports to their countries. These reports have already been handed to the Interpol and are being carefully studied.

According to the same diplomatic circles, the reports stress the fact that huge areas at Mnorphou, the Karpas peninsula, Lapithos and Akanthou have been converted into Indian cannabis plantations.

The reports also cite specific names of Turkish smugglers as well as of a number of European smugglers -- mainly Italian and West German — who come and go to the occupied areas and place big orders for narcotics.

In the meantime, the Turkish invaders have recently stolen an unknown quantity of narcotics from the Peace Force hospital at Xeros.

The UN has made representations to senior Turkish officers but the latter denied that their men have done such a thing.

On the other hand, last weekend 25 kilograms of hashish were found on the Kyrenia coast; some Turkish Cypriot papers have intentionally given great publicity to this find.

ACTIVITIES OF 'BOZKURT' TERRORISTS ENUMERATED

NC140924 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 14 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Members of the Turkish fascist organization "Bozkurt", which is affiliated with the party of Colonel Turkes, are being trained by the secret services of a neighboring country to carry out terrorist activities in foreign countries, including Cyprus.

Specifically, the goal of the "Bozkurt" members in Cyprus is to penetrate the free areas via the occupied areas and to carry ot provocative activities that will have unfavorable repercussions on Cyprus. Unconfirmed reports say a number of defectors, who were expelled by the authorities of the republic as soon as they came to the free areas, belonged to the "Bozkurt" organization.

Beyond this, agents of a secret service of a neighboring country have been spying on Cyprus and have been conveying the information they have collected in the free areas to the Turks.

According to our information, there is a secret agreement on the exchange of information that concerns the Arab countries, Greece and Cyprus. This agreement was signed recently between Turkey's security services and the secret service of the said neighboring country. On the basis of this agreement, the secret service of the said country collects information from the free areas and then conveys it to Ankara through the Denktas administration.

In connection with the extremist organization "Bozkurt", well informed circles have stressed that:

Turkish nationalist fascist organizations are operating in West Europe. These organizations are part of the forces of international terrorism.

It has been learned that "Bozkurt" has taken part in the assassination of some Turkish diplomats and that it has concealed its activites under the name of the well-known organization Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia [ASALA].

The purpose of these activites has been to rouse nationalist feelings against the Armenians.

According to the outcome of investigations, two assassinations — the Turkish ambassador in Vienna and a Turkish official in Paris — have been the work of "Bozkurt" and not of the Armenian organization ASALA.

But the Turks have never published these findings. Moreover, the Turkish leadership has concealed the fact that West German extremists took part in the assassination of the Turkish ambassador in Vienna. Prior to recent events in Lebanon, the Turkish fascists were training their cadres at camps belonging to Lebanese rightwing extremist groups.

NORTH FLIES FLAGS AT HALF-MAST FOR BREZHNEV

DENKTAS CASTIGATES GREEK CYPRIOT ACTIONS

TA151217 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 15 Nov 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that there is no possibility of the Turkish Cypriot community accepting a return to the past. The president was speaking at a ceremony commemorating the Turkish Cypriot fighters who died during the brutal Greek Cypriot attacks on the village of Kophinou. He said that these fighters had died while struggling to ensure a safe and secure future for their dependents and that they would never be forgotten.

President Denktas pointed out that an exchange of population agreement had been reached and implemented no matter what the Greek Cypriots were now saying. He added that the Greek Cypriots could continue their propaganda campaign in spite of all these facts, but that the Turkish Cypriot community would never accept a return to the past.

Referring to reports that the Greek Cypriots would be opening a new airport in Paphos, and the displaying of their newly acquired weapons, President Denktas said that he had nothing to add to what had been said to the Greek Cypriots by a foreign diplomat. The president quoted the diplomat as saying: If you are to use these weapons against the Turkish Cypriots, they are more than enough; but you should remember that Turkey would never leave the Turkish Cypriots alone and Turkey has enough power to crush you even if every single one of you were a castle.

President Denktas also referred to the recent arrest by the Greek Cypriots of Turkish Cypriots who had remained in southern Cyprus, on charges of spying for the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. He said that the Turkish Cypriot community did not send spies to southern Cyprus while the Greek Cypriots themselves were openly displaying their newly acquired weapons. The president invited the Greek Cypriots to stop living in a dream world. He called on them to return to the negotiating table for the establishment of a federal republic which would not permit the repetition of incidents similar to those of Kophinou. He stressed that the Greek Cypriots should understand that unless they convinced the Turkish Cypriots of their sincerity, there would be no possibility of a cooperation between the two communities.

PAPANDREOU CONFERS WITH LEADERS IN MOSCOW

Meets USSR's Tikhonov

[Text] At 1700 today Prime Minister Papandreou conferred with Tikhonov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, at the Kremlin for a half hour. In reference to the Papandreou-Tikhonov meeting, the Greek radio and television correspondent reported from Moscow that Greek-Soviet relations are entering a new phase according to evaluations by political observers in the Soviet capital after Papandreou's lengthy meeting today with Tikhonov.

This evaluation is also strengthened by the fact that Tikhonov's visit to Athens early next year, most probably in February, was confirmed, and by the joint resolve to entrust the two countries' Ministries of Foreign Affairs and National Economy with preparing this visit for signing of a series of economic agreements.

The two leaders' half-hour summit meeting was attended on the Greek side by Deputy Foreign Minister Karolos Papoulias; Deputy Minister on Press Issues Dhimitrios Maroudhas; the prime minister's diplomatic advisor, Khristos Makhairitsas, and Greek Ambassador to Moscow Metaxas.

Tikhonov stressed in particular that during his visit to Athens there most certainly will be an opportunity to have discussions more extensively and in depth on the international situation, on the special problems of the area and on bipartite affairs. Tikhonov reiterated to Papandreou that the USSR will continue Brezhnev's policy of detente, peace and disarmament. According to agency reports, Tikhonov stressed that the USSR unilaterally undertakes the obligation not to be the first to use nuclear weapons.

On his part, Papandreou stressed that the Greek Government sincerely believes that the USSR is firmly oriented toward the policy of detente and that it truly desires peace. He added that Greece, with the other Balkan countries, has undertaken the initiative to start a process of negotiations aimed at the denuclearization of the Balkans, and that following the cycle of his visits to Belgrade, Sofia and Bucharest, the foundations will be laid for the technical preparation for such a Balkan conference. Attainment of this goal, Papandreou added, will be a basic and not just a symbolic contribution to the efforts for strengthening peace in the world.

Authoritative sources mentioned that Tikhonov agreed that in fact something of this sort would certainly be an important contribution in this direction, adding that the USSR follows with particular interest Greece's policy and the efforts by the Athens government in promoting this policy, particularly in the European area.

Agency reports stressed that Tikhonov underlined to Papandreou that the Soviet leadership rejects the theory of a limited local nuclear war according to which the two superpowers could safely and painlessly conduct a confrontation in the European area. The Soviet leader's view is that this theory is cultivated by the United States and that basically this is a great imperialist bluff.

Poland's Jaruzelski

[Excerpts] This morning, Prime Minister Papandreou conferred with Polish Prime Minister General Jaruzelski with whom he had a private 40-minute meeting at the Greek Embassy in Moscow.

General Jaruzelski thanked Papandreou for the position the Greek Government took on the question of economic sanctions against Poland and he stressed that he will maintain the timetable for lifting martial law in his country, which is scheduled for completion within the next few months. It is noted that the liberation of Walesa falls within this timetable. Jaruzelski also stressed that democratic function of the trade union orgnaizations will be guaranteed under this process. Jaruzelski invited Prime Minister Papandreou to visit Poland officially.

Replying to a question on the matter, Papandreou stated he accepts the invitation to visit the Polish capital and, as agreed, the visit will take place after completion of the first phase for normalization of the political situation in Poland.

Castro, Other Leaders

[Excerpts] The Greek radio and television correspondent reports on Prime Minister Papandreou's meetings in Moscow: Earlier, at 1530, Prime Minister Papandreou had a lengthy meeting with Fidel Castro at the official residence where the Cuban leader is staying. The two men examined Third World problems and agreed that they are so vast and explosive that there is grave danger that the Third World, as well as the developed North, may be led to (?destruction).

Papandreou also had the opportunity to ask Castro -- a leading personality in the Non-aligned Movement -- to mediate actively, among the nonaligned and among his other strong allies, for a speedy and just solution to the Cyprus issue. Castro undertook a certain obligation to play this role.

On purely bipartite relations, Papandreou reiterated the Greek Government's intention to have embassies established in Havana and in Athens respectively. On his part, Castro expresed his great interest in Greek developments and renewed his invitation to the Greek prime minister to visit Cuba soon. The invitation was accepted and the date will be scheduled later through diplomatic channels.

Late in the afternoon, Papandreou also had a meeting with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar with whom he had an in-depth discussion on the Cyprus issue and the Middle East situation.

In addition to these private meetings, Papandreou also had the opportunity for meetings, naturally short, with Yuriy Andropov, Chernenko and Greshin, and Foriegn Minister Gromyko, who thanked him particularly for personally coming to Moscow to honor the late Soviet leader.

During the framework of the same official functions, and particularly during a meeting of foreign leaders with the Soviet leaders, Papandreou met U.S. Vice President Bush and Secretary of State Shultz, and the two agreed to meet in the future but no date was fixed. Other short meetings were with the Austrian president; the FRG president and foreign minister; 'Arafat; the French prime minister and others.

KKE BACKS GOVERNMENT STAND ON NATO EXERCISE

[Text] The Greek Government correctly canceled the Apex Express 82 exercise because once again NATO has proved with deeds that it is a mechanism operating against our national independence and integrity.

This was stressed by the secretary general of the KKE Central Committee, Kharilaos Florakis, in a press conference he gave today at the foreign correspondents club. The NATO issue, Florakis added, is not settling the issue of operational control in the Aegean outside NATO but is the issue of our country's withdrawal from this wolves' alliance.

The secretary general of the KEE Central Committee also referred to the issue of the bases. It is true, he said, that we have heard from the prime minister himself of a timetable beyond which the bases will go. However, there are timetables and timetables. We would unreservedly applaud the prime minister's statement if this timetable, in addition to the definition of a specific short period of time, would explicitly and categorically provide for the final withdrawal of all bases without new talks for a review or an extension.

In addition, in reply to a relevant question on the Yalta agreement and its [word indistinct] influence on our country's position, Florakis stressed that this agreement does not contain anything of what is being said concerning the division of the world into spheres of influence.

Florakis Press Conference

["Text" of opening statement by KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis at a press conference held at the Union of Foreign Press Correspondents in Athens on 12 November]

[Text] Honorable gentlemen: You must have noticed that during the last few days our country's political life has been dominated by the cancellation by the Greek Government of the NATO exercise known as Apex Express 82. This was an exercise that was to have taken place in Macedonia this month. But as to why in Macedonia, this is a different question.

The question of cancelling the exercise would probably have passed as something of no great importance if it were not directly connected with our country's major problem, the problem of our national independence and integrity.

The reasons the exercise was cancelled are known to you. What is the substance of the affair?

NATO, in which Greece is participating as a member and which is supposed to guard and defend our national independence and integrity, questions Greek sovereignty over part of the Greek state.

We believe that it is of no particular importance whether NATO is doing this to meet the aims of Evren's junta in the Aegean or as means to pressure the Greek Government for concessions, or even to create some excuse in connection with the whole question of "U.S. bases." What matters is that, for one reason or another or perhaps for all of them together, NATO has again proved by deed to be a mechanism which operates at the expense of our national independence and integrity.

The Greek Government has done the right thing in cancelling the exercise. However, this action does not go beyond the limits of a protest against NATO's hostile machinations. It in fact confines itself to a policy of choosing the "good" NATO exercises in which to participate and the "bad" ones to reject. We admit that we do not understand this differentiation. Even if the Limnos issue had not come up, the NATO exercises would not have ceased to be directly or indirectly against our national interests.

This NATO exercise affair and everything disclosed about it vividly portray our country's major democratic problem, the problem of our country's imperialist dependence.

Of course, our country's dependence on the U.S.-NATO imperialists is multifaceted; military, political, scientific, technical, cultural. However, the case of NATO and of the U.S. bases are the two main elements of our military-political dependence.

We believe that without radically facing these two main questions there cannot be the real change that our people demanded with their votes in October 1981.

Regarding answers to these questions, the government is referring us to the distant future. And one would ask: What else are we seeking from NATO? Have we not had enough with its contribution to the 7-year dictatorship, to the tragedy of Cyprus, to the encouragement of Turkish machinations and to its dirty game in promoting Greek-Turkish differences?

The NATO question is not the problem of internal NATO arrangements with regard to operational control over the Aegean. It is the problem of the withdrawal of our country from this wolf alliance.

As you know, the official Greek-U.S. negotiations on the bases were opened a few days ago. Unfortunately, we do not know the political framework within which these negotiations are taking place. The government has stated that it will brief the Chamber of Deputies when the negotiations are concluded. However, we do not know whether they are discussing the time and the way of removing the U.S. bases from our country, or the time and the conditions under which the bases will stay.

For us the question of U.S. bases is not a problem of "conditions" or of "bartering." If one does not forget that the U.S. bases have proved to be a decisive mechanism for the undermining of our national independence, national defense, democratic development and the social-political progress of our country; then one must agree that there is no room for "bargaining" or for bartering. National independence is a commodity that cannot be leased or exchanged. It is one of those things that cannot be set aside in the name of recognition of the strategic interests of any foreign country, of the U.S. strategic interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

Greece cannot go back to that terrifying situation of the 1950's. "We give our blood, and the United States its dollars."

It is true that we have heard from the prime minister himself of a definite timetable beyond which the bases will go. But there are timetables, and there are timetables. We would unreservedly approve of the prime minister's statement if this timetable, in addition to the definition of a specific short period, would explicitly and categorically provide for the final withdrawal of all the bases without new talks for a review or an extension.

On this occasion, I would like to inform you that the 11th congress of our party, the KKE, will be held next month. At this supreme party body, in addition to the Central Committee's report on its 4-year acitivities, the congress will discuss a concrete program for real change as well as certain central ideas that refer to problems connected with the prospects of socialism in our country.

Further Florakis Comments

[Press conference given by KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis at the Union of Foreign Press Correspondents in Athens on 12 November]

[Excerpts] E. Papayeoryiou (AKROPOLIS): You claim that it is not in Greece's interests to remain in NATO and to retain the bases on its soil. However, the reasoning propounded by the current government is that military aid useful to Greece in confronting the Turkish danger is guaranteed. Why do you disagree?

Florakis: In the first place, we are not the only ones who claim that Greece should withdraw from NATO and that the foreign bases should go. If I am not mistaken, even Yeoryios Papandreou once described NATO as a "curse." The current president of the republic, Karamanlis, removed Greece from the NATO military wing. Should one look at walls around Athens, one will still see slogans in green letters such as "Greece out of NATO" and "Out with the U.S. bases." These slogans were written by PASOK. However, even today I think that the prime minister generally does not deny that Greece's interests lie outside NATO and that the U.S. bases should be abolished. The only difference is that he is referring the solution of these problems to the distant future, or to another 4-year term.

We absolutely believe that the overwhelming majority of Greek people do not want Greece in NATO and that they do not want the U.S. bases. I will reveal to you a very typical discussion that I had with a New Democracy personality. When I told him "see that you do not miss the historical opportunity that has been offered to you," his reply was: "I know that if we call for elections now with the slogans 'Greece out of NATO' and 'Out with the U.S. bases,' we shall receive 70 percent of the votes and all others will disappear. Only you will survive, but we cannot do it."

Why do I mention this? Because it confirms what I said before -- the overwhelming majority of the Greek people support Greece's withdrawal from NATO and the abolition of the U.S. bases.

Of course, difficulties will result. There is the issue of the equipment for the armed forces. It is well known that our armed forces are lopsidedly armed with U.S. arms. However, we believe that these problems can be dealt with. Fortunately or unfortunately, the only thing one can easily find in the international marketplace is arms.

However, as regards dealing with the Turkish danger, our stay in NATO and the existence of the U.S. bases contribute nothing useful to our interests.

M. Gondikas (TIME): Your relations with PASOK have recently become tense. What in your opinion are the reasons? How will relations between the KKE and PASOK develop in the future?

Florakis: Relations among parties and, consequently, relations between the KKE and PASOK are not built on a sentimental basis. Bonds, friendships and alliances are developed on common goals, and it is natural that when a difference of assessments or of opinions on specific goals exists, correspondent relations are created. In any case, we believe that there are many points and common goals between the KKE and PASOK. On our part, we are doing everything we can to deal jointly with these problems. As to what will happen in the future, no one knows. This will depend on the policy to be followed by PASOK.

P. Stangos (Thessaloniki): You, too, must have ascertained a dramatic tone in the prime minister's speeches in the border areas and especially in Mitilini. Meanwhile, certain suspicions have been expressed that this tone constitutes an attempt to distract the people from domestic matters -- the economic and political problems facing the country. Since in your initial statement you focused criticism on foreign policy issues, I would like to ask whether you share the assessments that have been expressed?

Florakis: Many things happen in politics.... I cannot say that I share views similar to those expressed. I can only say: The cancellation of the Exercise [Apex Express-82] is merely a protest to NATO; it does not solve problems -- either the problem of Greece's dependence or the problem of dealing with threats against our sovereign rights.

M. Modiano (London TIMES): Mr Florakis, the prospect of economic development this winter increases the possibility that PASOK may ask for KKE's help, for the support of its government, so that it may avoid certain pressures from the economic crisis. In the statements you have made, you have already set two conditions for such cooperation -- withdrawal from NATO and abolition of the bases. Are there any other conditions?

Florakis: In my speech I did not set withdrawal from NATO and the abolition of the bases as conditions for any cooperation. What I said is that if these problems are not solved, we cannot seriously talk of a true change. This is what I said. As for the help we can offer PASOK on the economic problem -- how shall I say this -- we are not a benevolent fund. We are a political party. We know the difficult economic situation. We know that there is an economic crisis, but the issue is how shall we extricate ourselves from the crisis. In what direction should this problem be solved, because in any case, a time will come when Greece will extricate itself from the economic crisis, but will we come out of the crisis at the expense of the working people? In other words, will all the damage from the crisis be paid by the working people? Or will it be paid by the monopolies and the capitalists? Consequently, our position will be decided by the reply to this question.

M. Modiano: Your conditions are only economic?

Florakis: There are no purely economic conditions. It concerns a policy that will be followed, a policy that will concern Greece's extrication from the economic crisis. We shall never tell workers "tighten your belts" without having guarantees that after 1 or 2 years workers will begin living better.

Thus, we shall correspondingly define our stance by the policy the governing party will chart on this fundamental problems, which truly is currently a very serious problem for Greece. In any case, I can tell you right now that our stance will be to defend the interests and the standard of living of the working people.

ARMY SETS BAN ON RECRUITS READING POLITICAL PAPERS

NC132126 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 13 Nov 82 p 12

[Text] The Ministry of National Defense is to bring out a memorandum forbidding the reading of any political newspaper by recruits in the armed forces -- this includes army and air force. Technical and scientific journals which help aid the education of young people doing their military service will be allowed, however. This was announced by defense Undersecretary Dhrosoyiannis yesterday who explained that the measure was necessary because otherwise conflicts arose between recruits.

PAPANDREOU REMARKS ON IZMIR UNDER REVIEW

[Text] Ankara, (HURRIYET) -- Ankara has strongly reacted to Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou's assertion that "if necessary, Greece will demand the demilitarization of Izmir." Papandreou made this statement during an inspection of the military units on the Turkish border in western Thrace. Papandreou's remark is being evaluated by our government. Meanwhile, circles close to the government say that "Papandreou is spoiled and the adventurous policy he is pursuing could hurl the people of Greece into a calamity."

The Greek prime minister has, in recent weeks, constantly attacked Turkey, has argued that Turkey will attack his country and has periodically threatened Turkey. This has attracted the attention of those concerned with Turkish-Greek relations. Therefore, it has been decided that once Papandreou's words have been studied, he will be given a high-level answer.

A competent official who maintains that the issues between Turkey and Greece had not been resolved because of Greece's attitude summed up the situation as follows: "Papandreou has been spoiled. As long as we keep silent, hoping to settle our differences peacefully at the conference table, Papandreou is intolerably arrogant. He considers himself unchallenged. But the Aegean Sea is not an empty sea. It has begun to take the shape of a sea which is liable to produce many things for Greece. As Turks, we will not bow to faits accomplis. Those who attempt to create faits accomplish and who talk irresponsibly will be disillusioned. Our determined stand that Greece should comply with the treaties will continue."

Stating that the Aegean Islands and the Anatolian Peninsula are in fact very closely related (like brother and sister), complementing each other, the officials concerned added: "Nevertheless, we do not covet even an inch of other people's land, but we want both Greece and the friendly states to know that we will no longer remain indifferent to the militarization of the islands right under our nose."

The authorities have stated that thanks to his blackmail, which has been going on since last year, the Greek prime minister has secured a large amount of military aid for his country. They added that friendly countries should ignore Greek intrigues.

PAPER ASSAILS GREEK RIGHT TO MILITARIZE LIMNOS

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Limnos and the Other Islands..."]

[Text] One of the examples showing how we deceive ourselves in respect of our relations with Greece has manifested itself once again.

At a glance at the newspapers you will see that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou has disclosed his intention not to permit NATO countries to carry out military exercises in northern Greece and in the Aegean between 10 November and 15 December, unless they are prepared "to defend [Greek rights to have] military installations on the island of Limnos." Papandreou is annoyed with the NATO countries' considering the militarization of the Limnos island as contrary to the provisions of the Lausanne treaty.

Papandreou's argument is highly interesting: The honorable Papandreou says: "Limnos is a Greek island," and he continues: "In accordance with the Montreux treaty the Greek Government has every right to militarize this island."

Moreover, refusal in NATO circles to recognize this Greek Government's right is unacceptable to us. If the NATO planning committee refuses to accept the Greek suggestion,the NATO exercises in Greece will not be allowed to take place. First, let us examine the basic point on which Papandreou bases his arguments: Although it is a fact that limnos is currently under the Greek flag, it would be useful to find out whether "the Greek Government possesses every right to militarize the island in accordance with the Montreuv treaty."

Article 12 of the Lausanne treaty clearly states that the islands of Limnos, Samothraki, Mitilini, Khios, Samos and Ikaria shall be "demilitarized." This provision has also been confirmed by Article 4 of the "agreement governing the procedure to which the straits shall be subjected." The reason that Papandreous chooses to ignore these provisions and says "we can militarize Limnos according to the Montreux treaty," is that the introductory section of the Montreux treaty says "this agreement will replace the Lausanne treaty."

However, the Montreux treaty replaces the Lausanne treaty only in respect to those provisions for which new ones have been instituted. Otherwise, we would have to accept that the Montreux treaty has abolished the provisions of the Lausanne treaty on all matters, a view which was clearly rejected by the Greek delegate Nikolas Politis himself during the Montreux negotiations. As a matter of fact, neither the name of Limnos nor the names of the other islands cited in Article 12 of the Lausanne treaty are mentioned in the Montreux treaty. There is not the slightest reference in the provisions to the status of these islands.

The situation being what it is, Papandreou's argument that Greece is "entitled to militarize Limnos island according to the Montreux treaty" is sheer insolence.

Our words are valid not only for Limnos island but also for all the other Aegean islands. The militarization of these islands is openly contrary both to the Lausanne treaty and the 1947 Paris Peace Convention.

If we were to put it more correctly, these islands were ceded to Greece only on condition that they should not be militarized. Therefore, the militarization of the islands in question would amount to a violation of the condition which Greek sovereignty over them was born. Undoubtedly, violation of this condition is a matter that would endanger the security of Turkey.

In this matter, Papandreou should be both cautious and also watch his step.

PAPER SEES NO LINK BETWEEN RDF, AIRFIELD UPDATE

NC160921 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 11 Nov 82 p 2

["Looking at the World" column by Sami Kohen: "Eyes on the Gulf"]

[Text] Certain developments in recent days have attracted the attention of the world to the region known as "the Gulf,"which consists of the countries of the Persian Gulf. The worsening of the Iran-Iraq conflict, which has been going on for the past 25 months, tops the list of these developments. Failure of the diplomatic efforts exerted by various countries and organizations to bring this conflict to an end and the statements by the Iranian authorities that they will continue the war until Baghdad falls and Saddam is toppled have again destroyed all hopes for a cease-fire.

Meanwhile, we see that the Khomeyni regime has hardened its attitude not only against Iraq but also against the other Gulf countries. Iran has begun to use threatening language against Saudi Arabia because of its oil prices policy. According to reports from Lebanon, Iran is exerting intensive efforts to increase its religious influence in this country.

Among the countries which fear lest this influence should spread to them as well are Kuwait, Bahrain and the Arab Emirates. "The Gulf Cooperation Council" which these countries have formed is currently holding a summit conference in Bahrain. The main items on the agenda are political, strategic, security and economic cooperation among the Gulf states. The threat created by Iran in the area is also being addressed. We will know in the near future what kind of joint resolutions the leaders of the Gulf states will adopt in this respect, or if they will decide not to make any decisions at all.

The Gulf question has recently acquired importance for our country, too, but from another aspect: An article by famous U.S. journalist Anderson, comments subsequently made about it in Ankara, and finally, reports regarding the modernization of certain airfields in eastern Anatolia have all led to widespread speculations. Inspired by these speculations, comments have been made expressing the fear that Turkey might be drawn into the events in the Gulf.

These speculations and comments have been going on since the formation by the United States of a specifically trained force known as the Rapid Deployment Force (RDF), which is intended to intervene quickly in the Gulf when this becomes imperative. What is feared is that in desiring to counter foreign interference which might upset the regional balance and which might endanger the strategic and economic interests of the West, the United States would want to avail itself of the bases in Turkey which are meant for use only by NATO, thus harming Ankara's developing relations with the countries in the region.

Undoubtedly, the statements and writings of certain U.S. thinkers, journalists and even diplomats who wish Turkey and the other allies to contirbute to efforts which the United States might exert in countering Soviet intervention in the Middle East lend themselves to speculation and even worry.

However, we draw these conclusions from our recent contacts with the Turkish and U.S. authorities:

1. Turkey has not been approached to contribute to the RDF or to provide facilities to this force.

2. On several occasions, Turkey has communicated both officially and privately to the U.S. administration, to compentent State and Defense Department officials, that it does not intend to undertake any obligation or responsibility in this matter. It is also known that the Americans clearly understand this.

3. The "Rapid Reinforcement Force," which is purely intended for the defense of NATO within NATO but which has somehow been translated as "mobile force," has nothing to do with the force which has been formed by the United States for the Gulf. Therefore, the obligations connected with this special NATO force do not include the U.S. "RDF."

And yet, despite all this, isn't Washington planning something "for the future"? Does it not want Turkey to make some "contribution" when necessary?

Naturally, these possibilities cannot be brushed aside. But at this stage, they are all speculations and political gossip.

Several years ago the Turkish Government urged NATO to modernize some of its airfields to meet the demands of the day. The realization of such projects takes time. It is now reported that both NATO and the United States have allocated funds for this purpose. Undoubtedly, the instability of the region has compelled the Western powers to take action.

Turkey asked for this modernization, having in mind its own strategic requirements. When the developments in the area are taken into consideration, this modernization is both necessary and useful. It is in Turkey's own interests, and the facilities will be available for "national use" as well. No other conclusions should be drawn from this.

MINISTER PASIN COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH EEC

[Text] State Minister Sermet Refik Pasin has said that the relationship between Turkey and the EEC has turned into a series of obligations lacking the advantages of full membership and failing to meet expectations.

State Minister Pasin delivered the opening speech at a meeting held in Ankara on the issue of the EEC and the results of Turkey's joining it. He said that the commercial advantages within the Community were now equal for all members, and advantages beyond that were granted only to full members. He added that it had become impossible to talk about a privileged assocation relationship between Turkey and the EEC. Pasin pointed out that Turkey was a part of the West and it was essential to reassess the conditions and ways which would make it possible for Turkey's relations with the Community to be maintained. That is why, he recalled, it has been decided to advance the date for application to full membership in the EEC, and to do that after parliamentary democracy is established in Turkey.

The meeting being held in Ankara aims at training personnel who will work within the units to be established in every ministry to carry out technical relations with the Community.

CENTRAL BANK TO SET GOLD PRICE AS OF 16 NOV

[Text] As of tomorrow, the Turkish Republican Central Bank will determine the daily gold price. The selling and buying price of 24 carat gold bars will be announced together with the rates of foreign exchange. A statement issued by the Central Banks says that [passage indistinct]. Work is underway on the method of reflecting the new price on the value of the Central Bank's gold assets. The statement says that the announced gold price is only to inform the public, and adds that the price does not include workmanship for jewelry. The statement also says that this decision, which was taken by the Council of Ministers, is a continuation of the method to announce the daily rates of foreign exchange — all within the framework of Turkey's policy to open up to the outside world. The Central Bank statement adds that with the new system, the official price will be in harmony with the international market, and that the Central Bank might soon begin to purchase gold within the country, provided that the monetary and balance of payments policies allow it.

HURRIYET CITES MERITS OF NEW CONSTITUTION

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "A Brand New Beginning..."]

[Text] We are now in clear daylight. We can have a better vision of the future. The 1982 Constitution has been accepted by an indisputably vast majority and is now in operation. We have thus as a state and nation reached a new stage, that is, we have moved from "revolutionary conditions" to a "constitutional platform."

Although the voting results which have brought us to this stage appear on paper only as saying "Yes, to the Constitution" and as electing a new president of the republic, we must dwell on the significance of these results.

Let us first stress that the positive votes which were over 90 percent, must reflect confidence in the cadre -- headed by Hon Kenan Evren -- who have stood as its "guarantor" rather than in the Constitution. That this confidence should remain unshaken in the 26 months that have passed since 12 September is extremely meaningful and important.

Again, the second meaning of the votes symbolized in the Constitution is the fact that the Turkish people have not forgotten the "period of terror and anarchy," and that they still disapprove of the return of the mentality which has opened the way to that period. Therefore, those who opened the way to 12 Septmeber, must go back and reexamine their blunders. This is the attitude which will prove beneficial both to them and to our people in the future.

The outcome of the voting also bears a message to the "outside world", that is to the Council of Europe and the EEC. We believe that this message accentuates the determination of our country to achieve a constitutional order.

The referendum, carried out on 7 November on the Constitution, is an event with more than one product. One of these products is the fact that it has provided our state and nation with a new ground of jurisprudence; and another equally important product is that it has bestowed upon the Turkish Republic a president of whom it has been deprived for the past 32 months.

The new president of the republic elected by the referendum has all the qualities cherished by a vast majority of our people. He is a tested commander. He is a human being whose integrity is indisputably strong. He is convincing. He is sincere and sympathetic. He is a person whose common sense has successfully stood extremely hard tests. He has never been known to have failed in fulfilling the requirements of his mission toward his state and nation. Apart from all this, no one doubts his loyalty to a peaceloving democratic system.

It is comforting to know that the powers vested in the president of the republic by the Constitution will be exercised by a person who has these qualities. But it would be naive to think that the powers recognized by the Constitution will always remain in the hands to claim ownership of the Constitution and to protect it.

As a matter of fact, "what has to be done now is to forget the arguments about the Constitution and to identify ourselves with it." For, this Constitution is no longer Aldikacti's draft or the National Security Council's property. It belongs to all of us. What we have to do is to stop arguing that "the country cannot be administered with this Constitution," and instead prove that the country can be administered quite efficiently with it.

TCP CRITICIZES CONSTITUTIONAL REFERENDUM RESULTS

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee statement issued on 8 November -- read by announcer]

[Text] The junta generals who assumed power through the bayonets, obtained through the same means, achieved the results they wanted in Sunday's Constitution referendum. The dictatorship of the collaborationist and monoplist bourgeoisie has been concealed behind the cover of the Constitution. The republican system has been replaced by the Evren dictatorship.

As the first results of the referendum began coming in, it was clear that the generals allowed 6 to 7 percent of no votes.

The fact that the amount of no votes was proportionally the same all over the country is enough to demonstrate the junta's plot. With a resolution made on the eve of the referendum voting, the military junta transferred the authority to announce the official results from the High Election Council to its own secretariat. This was a step taken in order to forge the referendum results. The people were not allowed to monitor the voting results. The junta announcements on the results are far from being convincing. The fact that in polling boxes in which the journalists and the people were able to check the results, the no votes were in a majority proves the truth of this assertion.

It was expected that the opposition of the Constitution which was gathering force on the eve of the referendum would not be reflected in the results. From the very beginning, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] warned that the referendum was not democratic and would not reflect the real wishes of the people. Therefore, the TCP appealed to the democratic forces not to wait for the referendum day and to act forcefully for the realization of a real and democratic referendum. The party, taking the situation into consideration, stated that it would not be enough to issue statements and that efforts should be made to unite the forces and to engage in an organized campaign among the people. Communists have bravely struggled to reach these goals. However, certain forces opposing the Constitution were not completely able to resist the junta's pressures and to be sufficiently active.

By dividing the opinion of millions of citizens who were against the Constitution, the circles of the defunct reactionary Democratic Party have served the purpose of the junta. These circles confused the masses by spreading the rumor that if the Constitution was rejected that would create a crisis in the country. As a result, they have supported all the antipeople articles of the Constitution and they are continuing to do so.

The present reactionary military dictatorship in Turkey has not achieved any success in the referendum as the voting results were influenced by a design, forcing the citizens almost in all the polling stations to choose the voting slip in the open. The TCP goal of inflicting a heavy blow to the junta in the referendum has generally been realized. Despite the unequal conditions under which the struggle for the referendum was waged, the democratic forces united under the slogan of "No to the junta Constitution." The junta was alienated. The strife among the reactionary forces deepened. Even the Justice Party who in principle approved of the Constitution, were unable to voice their approval of this antipeople Constitution openly.

No matter what intrigues they used on the referendum results, the generals have been weakened by this voting. The military junta does not rest on the suspicious votes it received but on the support of NATO and the U.S. imperialism. It is not a coincidence that the likes of Reagan were the first to applaud the results of the constitutional referendum. In the agitation caused by the campaign in favor of the Constitution conducted by the junta for months prior to the referendum, the junta has made steps which trample upon Turkey's national security and independence. Plans are being matched for the stationing of the U.S. Rapid Deployment Forces [RDF] and the new nuclear missiles in our country. New bases have been provided to the United States. These developments are more threatening than the forcing of the antipeople Constitution through oppression.

Efforts by U.S. imperialism to drag Turkey into the worldwide aggressive policies are a threat to the very existence and right to life of our people; who have been deprived of their liberties through the new Constitution. More than ever, the fate of the struggle being waged for democracy and prosperity of the people depends on bending the arm of Reagan's followers and stopping Evren's policies of treason.

Our task now is to unify the struggle of those opposing the antipeople Constitution and favoring democracy and the struggle being waged by millions of toilers for their social rights with the struggle being waged for the sake of peace and independence against the RDF troops, new nuclear missiles and U.S. bases in our country.

In the wake of the referendum, a more difficult and demanding struggle is awaiting our people. All democratic and national forces must unite against the dictatorship of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie and U.S. imperialism.

VOTCP CITES U.S. ENVOY ON SECRET AGREEMENT

[Text] Robert Strausz-Hupe, the U.S. ambassador to Turkey, has said that Turkey and the United States have signed a secret military agreement. A French agency report from Ankara says that in a press statement, the U.S. ambassador added that in accordance with this agreement it will be possible to store NATO equipment and hardware at certain airports in Turkey. In his statement, which appeared in yesterday's DAILY NEWS in English, Strausz-Hupe refused to specify the number of airports involved in this agreement as this was secret information. The U.S. ambassador is reported to have said that airports in eastern Anatolia as well as other parts of the country were involved.

This statement by the U.S. ambassador demonstrates the truth of earlier reports to this effect from Turkish Communist Party sources, in local and foreign press organs and most recently in THE WASHINGTON POST on 7 November.

Both Foreign Ministry spokesman Ambassador Akiman and the foreign minister himself have tried to deny the signing of such an agreement. Defense Minister Bayulken has said on the subject that the issue was the modernization of 10 airposts in eastern Anatolia within the framework of NATO and with NATO funds.

PERTINI BEGINS TALKS TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 15 -- Italian head of state Sandro Pertini today began his consultations aimed at the designation of a new cabinet to replace the outgoing coalition headed by Giovanni Spadolini who resigned Saturday. This morning Pertini met with two former heads of state, Giuseppe Saragat and Giovanni Leone, House Speaker Nilde Jotti, and representatives of the mixed groups in the House or Senate, the South Tyrol Volkspartei, the proletarian democrats and the independent left.

Senate speaker Amintore Fanfani, who is in Moscow today for the funeral of Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, was received by Pertini Saturday.

This afternoon Pertini will meet with delegations from the Liberal Republican and democrat parties, the three minor partners in the outgoing government.

It is said that there is considerable irritation within Spadolini's own Republican Party over the way in which the coalition's two chief partners -- the Christian Democrats and the Socialists -- sparked the crisis.

Sunday, the PRI leader issued a document declaring that the collegiality of the executive had been betrayed and only one commentary advanced the view that the Republicans might withdraw from the government majority.

All observers concurred, in any case, that the crisis would be a long one and that the options were either a stopgap cabinet until early elections could be held in spring or one which could last till the natural end of the legislature in 1984.

[Text] The new Congress of Deputies, in which there will be a Socialist majority will be constituted this week.

The constituent session scheduled for Thursday will initially be chaired by the oldest deputy-elect, who will be assisted by the two youngest, acting as secretaries. The oldest deputy is the Socialist Maximo Rodriguez Valverde, who will preside. There are three points on the agenda for the session: Reading of the decree of convocation; election of the officials of Congress and its president; and finally, the president-elect once he has taken office, will ask the remaining deputies to swear or promise to observe the Constitution. For this they will be called on in alphabetical order. The presidency will in all likelihood fall to the Socialist, Greogorio Peces-Barba. Within the next 15 days the solemn session to open the legislature is to be held.

BULGARIAN CHESS PLAYER REQUESTS ASYLUM 15 NOV

[Excerpt] Lucerne, Nov 15 (AFP) -- Bulgarian chess player Tatiana Lemachko, who has been competing in the chess olympics here, is understood to have asked for political asylum in Switzerland.

Soviet-born Lemachko, 35, who has lived in Bulgaria for nine years following her marriage to a Bulgarian national, apparently made her plea for asylum at a police station here today, although there has so far been no confirmation from the Swiss police.

Lemachko, a qualifier for the challengers' tournament for a crack at the women's world title, should meet the Soviet Union's Nana Aleksandrova in the quarter-finals. She has a six-year-old daughter, still in Sofia, whom she hopes will be allowed to rejoin her here.

The Swiss authorities later officially confirmed that the Bulgarian International Grandmaster was under their protection. It was still not known for certain if Lemachko had asked to be allowed to live in Switzerland or in another country. Rumours circulating here suggest that other foreign chess players competing here have contacted the authorities to sound them out on the possibility of political asylum but without, so far, making formal requests. Lemachko is the sixth Soviet chess [word indistinct] to ask for political asylum while competing in competitions abroad.

Lemachko was understood to have finally taken the decision to defect after being admonished for "indiscipline" after failing to return to her hotel until one in the morning after going out for the evening with two fellow players.

She was apparently threatened, by one of the Bulgarian team bosses, with not be being able to compete in the world championship challengers' tournament, nor continuing to play for the Bulgarian team nor being allowed to leave Bulgaria again.

CSSR'S HUSAK ASKED TO FREE POLITICAL PRISONERS

[Editorial article: "Appeals for Political Prisoners on the Eve of Husak Visit"]

[Summary] "The visit to Austria of Czechoslovak state-party head Gustav Husak, which will begin tomorrow, Wednesday, has once again focused attention on the human rights situation in the CSSR, which remains as alarming as ever. In a number of instances, international human rights organizations have appealed to the CSSR head of state to endorse the liberation of political prisoners in his country."

In a letter to Husak, Amnesty International has named three prisoners for reasons of conscience -- Social Democrat Rudolf Battek, Ivan Jirous and Jaroslav Javorsky -- who are being supported by Austrian amnesty groups. This group has also asked Chancellor Kreisky to support this appeal as well as to intervene in favor of imprisoned Albert Cerny, signer of Charter 77. Several prominent writers are supporting an appeal of AIDA, the International Association for the Defense of persecuted Artists, to release Czechoslovak dramatic artist Vaclav Havel from prison. A group of theology students and candidates for the priesthood, in an open letter, have expressed their concern and displeasure at the conditions concerning the training of priests in the CSSR.

This included an agreement completing the accord on the mutual recognition of secondary school graduation certificates, but also problems of mutual interest related to European cooperation, particularly in the European Council and with respect to the CSCE conference. Minister Pahr announced that the conclusion of a culture agreement with Liechtenstein can also be expected.

He termed the mutual relations free from problems and of a particularly friendly nature.

SLOVENE OFFICIALS EXPLAIN TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS

AU162130 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 13/14 November carries a Branimir Soucek dispatch from Innsbruck concerning a 3-day visit of Jernej Jan, president of the Slovene Committee for International Cooperation, to Tirol, where he held talks on developing regional economic relations. Jan underscored that obligatory deposits for travel abroad were purely an economic necessity. Since there are no restrictions on "organized travel" of a political, economic or cultural nature, Jan does not see the "humanitarian objectives" of the CSCE violated. Trying to refute the assertion that the recent Yugoslav measures have economically hurt Austrian and Italian border regions, Jan pointed to increases in the Italian-Yugoslav commodity exchange within the Italian-Yugoslav agreement on traffic in areas close to the border in the first 10 months of 1982. He also complained that thus far, Austria has shown no interest in concluding a similar agreement. Ashed about the future of tourism in his country, Jan pointed out that he did not see it in "precisely rosy colors."

Vienna DIE PRESSE on 15 November on page 8 carries an "M.W." report from Ljubljana entitled "Obligatory Deposits: Yugoslavs Admit Breach of Treaty," reporting on talks between Julka Zibert, president of the Slovene Committee for Transportation and Communication, and a delegation of top Carinthian politicians at Brdo Castle near Ljubljana on Saturday. Zibert maintains that 400,000 persons have crossed the Yugoslav border since the validation of the obligatory deposits for travel abroad, but only 9,135 have had to make the required deposit. The Carinthian delegation headed by Deputy Governor Fruehbauer and Chamber of Commerce President Karl Baurecht explained the Carinthian position and pointed out the violation of bilateral agreements by the restrictive measures. The Slovene politicians were unable to make any specific promises about getting the restrictions rescinded, but admitted that the restriction in the number of local border crossings to five annually and the limiting of commodity imports to 2,500 dinars constitutes a violation of agreements on border traffic. On 24 November, a Styrian delegation will discuss the same topic with the Slovene government in Maribor. The next meeting between Carinthia and Slovenia will take place in January or February in Carinthia.

Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German on 15 November on page 2 carries an APA dispatch from Klagenfurt on the talks conducted by Carinthian Deputy Governor Fruehbauer and Slovene Transport Committee President Zibert over the weekend in Brdo, noting that "local border traffic between Austria and Yugoslavia shall remain unaffected by the Yugoslav exit restrictions and shall be maintained in full. This is the most substantial outcome of the talks between the two officials." This means that the Yugoslav residents of the border area need not make obligatory deposits and that the imported commodities will not be subjected to such drastic restrictions. There will also be a corresponding easing of restrictions on travel abroad of students, sportsmen, cultural workers and migrant workers.

CHANCELLOR KOHL INTERVIEWED ON WASHINGTON TALKS

[Interview with Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Fritz Pleitgen in Washington on 15 November -- recorded]

[Text] President Reagan and Chancellor Helmut Kohl have met so far for 2 hours and 30 minutes. When they left the White House today, a comprehensive communique was already available which states that absolute agreement exists on all significant issues. One of the issues was East-West relations after the death of Leonid Brezhnev. Improved relations were advocated, albeit based on a firm common attitude. Freezing nuclear weapons at the current level was considered to be out of the question.

[Answer] In this very important year, during which negotiations in Geneva are moving to a certain point, it should be seen whether or not positive results will be achieved there. If not, this will mean that the second part of NATO's counterarmament decision will come into force and that we will begin deployment. Every opportunity for sensible talks must be exploited. Therefore, my advice was -- I gave this to the American President when he was in Bonn this summer attending the NATO summit -- to meet with the then general secretary who was buried today. My advice now is also to take up contacts and to talk to him [as heard] if possible so as to take advantage of every opportunity for sensible talks.

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] How did he react?

[Answer] I believe that the American President is aware of his special responsibility, especially in these very difficult times.

[Question] Does he see a chance for positive changes in East-West relations?

[Answer] I don't know. He basically has as much information at present as we do -- nobody can say what the new leadership will do. Thus, it is all the more important to take early exploratory measures.

[Question] Did you again discuss the lifting of American economic sanctions regarding the Soviet natural gas pipeline?

[Answer] I believe that this was favorably settled prior to my visit. Everybody knows here that I am not the inventor of this natural gas-pipline business, nor am I a fan regarding this matter, as people say here, but the contracts exist and I insist that serious policy must be reliable policy. Fulfilling existing contracts is part of reliability.

[Question] Paris has disassociated itself somewhat from this treaty or agreement between the Western industrial nations. Did you discuss this again today?

[Answer] We discussed it, but I fell this is not a matter for public discussion at present. We have to see how the continuing negotiations finally develop. I am rather optimistic.

[Question] So you are certain there will be no friction in the future between Bonn and Washington regarding the problem of East-West trade?

[Answer] Yes, I don't think there will be.

Kohl 'Extremely Satisfied'

LD170828 Hamburg DPA in German 0748 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn, 17 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl returned to Bonn this morning from a 3-day political visit to the United States. He told journalists that he is extremely satisfied with the results of his trip. Kohl arrived from New York where he had a meeting with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar. His U.S. visit had centered on a meeting with U.S. President Reagan in the White House.

CARSTENS, GENSCHER ON TALKS WITH USSR'S ANDROPOV

[Interview with Federal President Karl Carstens and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher by unidentified reporter in Moscow; date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Carstens] We passed the greetings of Chancellor Kohl to him [CPSU General Secretary Yuriy Andropov] and then we discussed a number of bilateral problems and international political problems. I was impressed by the far-reaching knowledge demonstrated by the general secretary in one of his first discussions on foreign policy matters.

[Question] Mr Foreign Minister, what was the subject of these talks?

[Genscher] The federal president outlined the FRG's policy, and the general secretary appreciated the fact that the federal chancellor and the Federal Government have expressed the intention to continue its policy toward the Soviet Union on the basis of the treaties and within the European framework, that is, within the CSCE framework. Actually, all issues having some current bearing on East-West relations were discussed.

[Question] Were there any surprises during the talks?

[Carstens] I would say not.

[Genscher] No, I can't say there were.

[Question] What impressions did you gather here in Moscow?

[Carstens] Well, I would say that I feel it was good for us to come here and thus have an opportunity for comprehensive talks not just with Mr Andropov and Mr Honecker, but also with a large number of other personalities. I believe that in this respect we can return quite satisfied.

[Question] Mr Foreign Minister, your comment?

[Genscher] We were impressed by the seriousness with which people in the Soviet Union are attempting to maintain international contacts in this difficult situation.

Further on Delegation's Views

[Excerpts] Bonn, 16 Nov (DPA) -- The German delegation has returned from Brezhnev's funeral in Moscow with the impression that the new Soviet leadership is clearly interested in international contacts. A visit to Bonn by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko seems a possibility, although no date was mentioned. Diplomatic circles described as particularly noteworthy the mention of Afghanistan by the Soviet side in political talks on the sidelines of the ceremonies.

These circles do not rule out the possibility that the new general secretary, Yuriy Andropov, could undertake efforts to correct the Afghanistan adventure. Similar conjectures were also made following talks between the new leadership and Pakistan head of state Mohammad Ziaul Haq and with Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua and Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi.

In the sideline talks, the Soviet leaders also stressed their interest in economic cooperation and mentioned East-West relations as well as arms control and disarmament problems. Diplomatic circles emphasized their impression that Andropov considers it important to be regarded from the outset as the decisive force in the new leadership.

For the German delegation, other results of the talks on the sidelines of the funeral ceremonies include information about plans for a further easing of conditions in Poland. According to this information, the Polish leaders are planning to lift martial law, imposed 13 December 1981, on the 13th of next month, or at the latest by the turn of the year.

Bonn diplomatic circles pointed to the link with the new Polish trade union law, which is to come into force on 1 January, 1983.

GENSCHER ON FDP, FOREIGN POLICY PROBLEMS

DW151739 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 15 Nov 82 pp 20-28

[Interview with Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and foreign minister, by editors Paul Lersch and Richard Kiessler at the Foreign Ministery in Bonn; date not given]

[Excerpts] SPIEGEL: Hatred, resentment, shock and tears -- such things have never happened before at a party congress, aren't you at all impressed by that?

Genscher: Nobody can ignore the impression made by this party congress. The party congress demonstrated, by the way, that following the discussions during the past weeks and the personnel decisions, the great majority of delegates are determined to do some real work and stick together with a view to the future.

SPIEGEL: It will be difficult for many to stay with you after such strong disagreement.

Genscher: Everyone must now approach each other and in some cases probably also make new beginnings with each other. There were some voices which clearly indicated that some party members can only visualize the FDP as a coalition partner of the SPD. However, the question of the FDP's sovereignty and independence was the subject of discussion. The Berlin party congress definitely decided that the FDP doesn't consider itself to be emotionally linked as an appendage to any other party, that is the SPD or the CDU/CSU.

SPIEGEL: Mr Genscher, why don't you concede that the decisive reason for the change of the coalition was your fear that the FDP could be pulled under by the downward trend of the SPD?

Genscher: If that were true I would have brought the change about in 1981, and thus I can't concede something that doesn't exist.

SPIEGEL: For 13 years the liberals functioned as a watchman over the constitutional state through the Ministry of the Interior. Mr Zimmermann said in a talk with DER SPIEGEL that you didn't fight for this ministry this time. Why not?

Genscher: We did fight for it, but we have to realize that we are governing together with a partner who is the strongest faction in the Bundestag. This was not the case with the Social Democrats....

SPIEGEL: That's not a particularly striking argument because in 1972 the SPD was the strongest faction.

Genscher: It certainly is a good argument. I can only say that in 1976 and 1980 the SPD was not the strongest party.

SPIEGEL: Franz-Josef Strauss now wants to force you into the Ministry of the Interior.

Genscher: I will not enter into the quarrel over positions. After 6 March we will discuss policies, and once we have reached agreement on policies, we will discuss who can credibly represent them.

SPIEGEL: Do you want to regain the Ministry of the Interior for the FDP, as was decided by the party congress, or is it true that if Mr Baum were to return to this post, you would feel a bit uneasy because his strong constitutional state policy goes too far for you?

Genscher: Your feelings are misleading you. I would like to see him in the government. Everyone knows how important I consider the Ministry of the Interior as well as environmental protection to be.

SPIEGEL: New Chancellor Helmut Kohl has spoken about reviving the principles of foreign policy. What is there to be revived?

Genscher: Revival in the sense of strengthening.

SPIEGEL: The word continuity, which you always use in this connection, doesn't appear in Kohl's vocabulary.

Genscher: It is important for it to exist.

SPIEGEL: Continuity will probably be demonstrated in connection with counterarmament. You told your fellow party members in Berlin that serious negotiations will take place in Geneva. The Soviets are saying the opposite.

Genscher: That is skirmishing by the Russians. The Americans are seriously negotiating. The Russians are also seriously negotiating, but their aim is unacceptable for us, namely the cementing of Soviet superiority.

SPIEGEL: You also said in Berlin that regarding this subject you intend "to abide by what the party congress decides." So, in the event of a negative FDP vote, you intend to resist the deployment of new American medium-range missiles?

Genscher: In connection with such a grave decision, I don't want to contradict the responsibility I bear as party chairman. I will naturally have to my decision myself in the end — a decision based on my conscience.

SPIEGEL: Would you accept a different vote, or do you expect a majority for counterarmament?

Genscher: I expect negotiation results which will meet with agreement at the party congress.

SPIEGEL: Do you share the statement by Manfred Woerner, your colleague in the cabinet, that the Geneva negotiations should also be continued after a possible deployment?

Genscher: We want a bilateral renunciation of medium-range missiles. If we don't achieve this by the fall, or if we don't achieve it totally, then I will resist a breaking off of the disarmament neogtiations with all my strength.

I am, therefore, astounded by the statements by Mr Bahr. I must put the question to the SPD whether, in the event the negotiations do not fully achieve the goal we desire, it wants the negotiations to be broken off. Anyone who wants this expects the German people to engage in an arms race.

SPIEGEL: Bahr wants something compeltely different. If no results are achieved by 1983, further negotiations should perhaps take place without deploying the missiles beforehand.

Genscher: That is a deviation from past government policy, and it is a deviation from Helmut Schmidt's 12 points. I fear even more now that the SPD intends to do this. Through his somewhat hastly assessment of Woerner's statement, Egon Bahr has revealed that the SPD is looking for every possible reason to do this. If the SPD runs away now, then it is endangering success at the negotiations. That is a grave responsibility.

SPIEGEL: The government's intention is decisive, however, and not the policy of the opposition.

Genscher: The opposition also bears responsibility for steadfast adherance to both parts of NATO's dual decision so that the Soviet Union won't foster the wrong hopes. In the interests of successful negotiations in Geneva, the SPD should, therefore, quickly eliminate all doubts regarding its attitude.

SPIEGEL: Do you fear there could be an election campaign over missiles?

Genscher: No.

SPIEGEL: You want to have an election campaign aimed against the country becoming ungovernable. Do you think this is enough to demonstrate the FDP's right to exist?

Genscher: We will fight for realistic aims; so far we have always been successful in this respect.

SPIEGEL: In 1980 you gained voters by promising to keep Strauss out.

Genscher: I haven't heard that he is again running for the office federal chancellor.

SPIEGEL: Perhaps, however, for the office of foreign minister. You have already said that foreign policy must remain predictable. Is Mr Strauss predictable?

Genscher: I don't want to oepn a new discussion about Strauss, although sometimes the impression is given that there are some people in the CSU who absolutely want to make the voters face the alternative of either Strauss of Genscher as foreign minister. However, I won't take part in this.

SPIEGEL: What a pity because it could only help you in the election campaign.

Genscher: I would like to leave that up to the judgement of the voters.

SPIEGEL: Mr Genscher, how long do you intend to serve as party chairman?

Genscher: I have been elected for 2 years; we will see what happens then.

SPIEGEL: You want to stay at the top of the party for these 2 years?

Genscher: Yes, if it is possible for me.

SPIEGEL: A most cautious formulation.

Genscher: The Lord has a say too.

SPIEGEL: It it not a matter of the Lord....

Genscher: ...for me it is. This might also be a point on which we differ from each other.

SPIEGEL: We were thinking of Graf Lambsdorff. Will he possibly replace you in the top position in the near future?

Genscher: I am happy about all the support I receive.

SPIEGEL: Do you intend to first wait for the public prosecutor's investigations into the donation affair?

Genscher: We have never discussed such issues from this viewpoint.

DEVELOPMENT AID TO EL SALVADOR TO BE RESUMED

LD161826 Hamburg DPA in German 1617 GMT 16 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 16 Nov (DPA) — Bonn will resume its development aid to El Salvador. The Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation announced today in response to an inquiry that Minister Juergen Warnke (CSU) has decided that the DM27.5 million that had been promised earlier will be freed for payment. Whether El Salvador will receive promises of further financial aid in 1983 will be decided "on the merits of the situation."

Bonn development aid for El Salvador was halted in April 1980 by the then SPD/FDP Federal Government on the grounds that the safety of German development aid workers was not guaranteed.

LEADERS COMMENT ON LIFTING OF U.S. SANCTIONS

[Unattributed report: "France Is Not Party to the Agreement Announced by Washington"]

[Text] "France, which informed its allies at the appropriate time of its position regarding East-West trade conditions as proposed by the United States, is not party to the agreement announced in Washington," a Quai d'Orsay spokesman said on 14 November. "It takes note of Mr Reagan's decision to lift the U.S. emgargo on supplies destined for the Soviet Union, especially in connection with the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline." The spokesman added that the French Government "thinks it useful to pursue the discussion on East-West trade," but that although that discussion had "made it possible to achieve progress," it has not produced "final conclusions" and that nothing has been signed.

For his part, Budget Minister Fabius told the Europe 1 Press Club that the lifting of the U.S. embargo was "a very good thing," but that France does not agree that a link should be established between the lifting of that "unilateral" and "unjustified" decision and other questions: "Talks have been started at the ambassadorial level on East-West relations but they have not been completed and there is therefore no agreement," he said. Similarly, Industry and Research Minister Chevenement told French Television Channel 2 that the U.S. decision "was taken unilaterally like the embargo decision, even though we are in an alliance." Nonetheless, he added that the U.S. gesture will facilitate the resumption of normal consultations between allies.

It should be remembered that Mr Mitterrand had very strongly asserted the French stance on this subject at the end of the Franco-British summit in Paris on 5 Nobember. Describing the U.S. embargo decision as "unilateral, unjust, legally highly dubious and politically unacceptable," the president had added: "If the matter can be settled, so much the better, but not in return for concessions in other spheres.... That is out of the question for France." Nonetheless, Paris was "of course" prepared to "discuss the conditions to be laid down in trade with the Eastern block countries, especially in technological spheres."

LE MONDE Views Decision

[Editorial: "Overcoming a Dangerous Situation"]

[Text] Since the beginning of the negotiations opened in Washington in September between the U.S. Government, the EC countries, Japan and Canada, it had been clear that Mr Reagan had placed himself in a dangerous situation by imposing an embargo on supplies to be used in the construction of the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline and more especially, by extending that embargo in June to all foreign subsidiaries of U.S. companies and to foreign enterprises working under U.S. license.

That embargo, which was the result of a personal decision by the President, taken against the advice of most of his advisers and which was to lead to the resignation of Mr Haig, then secretary of state, had in fact done more damage to what he wanted to strengthen -- the Atlantic alliance's cohesion -- than to the Soviet Union which he wanted to punish.

Everybody realized that the reason officially invoked -- the military coup d'etat in Poland -- was merely a pretext seized upon by the teams of "hardliners" surrounding the President in the White House to promote a much more ambitious plan: to bring the Soviet Union "to its knees" by aggravating its economic difficulties and by cutting off its foreign currency sources; in short, by further reducing the narrow base on which its military power is built.

The European countries do not share that objective. They particularly opposed it since the U.S. President, by resuming grain supplies to Moscow on a large scale, was simultaneously giving his farmers the advantage he was refusing to the exporters of capital goods. However, the latter included his own industrialists. There is reason to believe that their opinion was also decisive.

However, it was difficult to imagine that the President would life the embargo without obtaining anything in return. France had seemed to accept that by joining in the Washington talks in the past few weeks. After all, if Paris wanted to be absolutely sure that Washington would unilaterally revoke the unilateral and "politically unacceptable" decision which Mr Mitterrand had condemned, it would have been best to avoid any contact before that precondition had been met. That is not what happened and the French Government in turn locked itself into a rather theoretical opposition by asserting that the gas pipeline did not feature in the program for those discussions.

It is true that no formal agreement was reached in Washington. "The substantial agreement on a plan of action" to which Mr Reagan referred is suitably vague and strangely reminiscent of the pledges to coordinate policies to which the communique on the unfortunate Versailles summit already referred.

The present misunderstanding between Paris and Washington relates, therefore, mainly to the way in which Mr Reagan announced his decision -- although the White House informed the Elysee in advance of the content of the presidential speech. If that is all that is involved, the misunderstanding should not persist beyond the bittersweet communiques issued in the past 48 hours. But there is no sign that France, any more than its other European allies, is prepared to adopt the Reagan philosophy of East-West trade.

MITTERRAND HAS TALKS WITH HUSAYN, ARAB LEAGUE

[Text] Paris, Nov 16 (AFP) -- King Husayn of Jordan, at the head of an Arab League delegation, today had talks with French President Francois Mitterrand on the Middle East.

The delegation, assigned the task of explaining the peace plan which emerged from the Arab League summit conference in Fes last September to all premanent member-nations of the United Nations Security Council, included the Syrian, Saudi, Algerian and Tunisian foreign ministers.

Faruq Qaddumi, head of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) political department, was also in the delegation.

King Husayn later described the meeting with President Mitterrand's "very encouraging and useful" and said there were overall more points of agreement than disagreement between the French and Arab positions.

Asked about the possibility of mutual recognition among the Arab states and Israel as recommended by France, the Jordanian ruler said he believed the goal could be reached once all parties had definitely embarked on the path for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

A spokesman for President Mitterrand said there had been a "convergence" in the Arab and French approaches. But he stressed the French position on the necessity of mutual recognition as a condition for dialogue as stated by Mr Mitterrand earlier before the Israeli parliament.

Husayn Meets Syria's Khaddam

JN161614 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1500 GMT 16 Nov 82

[Text] In Paris today, His Majesty King Husayn received 'Abd al-Halim Khaddam, Syrian deputy prime minister and foreign minister. They discussed the mission of the seven-member committee and its moves on the international level to outline the Arab peace plan. They also discussed Jordanian-Syrian relations.

Meets Other Foreign Ministers

[Text] This evening, His Majesty King Husayn received at his place of residence in Paris, Algerian Foreign Minister Dr Ahmed Taleb Ibrahimi, who was accompanied by the Algerian ambassador in Paris.

Later in the evening, His Majesty received Saudi Foreign Minister His Highness Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal, who was also accompanied by the Saudi ambassador in Paris.

The two meetings focused on the outcome of the King Husayn-led seven-member committee's meeting with President Mitterrand. His Majesty discussed with the two ministers the means of bolstering the joint Arab efforts on the international level in order to gain more world support for the Arabs' primary cause. Jordan's relations with Algeria and Saudi Arabia were also discussed.

Cheysson Comments on Contacts

NC170948 Cairo MENA in English 0815 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 17 (MENA) -- Minister for External Relations Claude Cheysson declared that the joint Egyptian-French project was discussed at the Arab-French contacts yesterday in Paris as it includes principles acceptable by all Arab countries represented in the Arab seven-man-committee currently visiting France.

Cheysson told the MIDDLE EAST NEWS AGENCY that the French-Egyptian project comprises targets very close to those included in the Fes resolutions. It affirms the right to self-determination for all the people including the Palestinian people which therefore necessitates the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organisation in the negotiations, which are points absent in the American President's initiative.

The French minister further said that he discussed with King Husayn last night matters connected with French-Jordanian relations.

Cheysson further said that the target of the Arab negotiations was to expound the Fes conference peace project and the joint visualisation of the Arab League countries to the French president.

He declared that the clear and important matter to France was that when the Arabs rally, their voice becomes stronger and effective.

The Fes summit and the formation of the committee were the best proof of a united Arab will that started in Fes.

The French minister asserted that France concentrates its interest on resolving the issue of Lebanon and on the application of the Security Council resolution regarding the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

He pointed in this respect to the steps which France has taken and which he said were risky and expressed readiness for other risky steps if needed.

MITTERRAND INTERVIEWED ON UPCOMING INDIA VISIT

BK170349 Hong Kong AFP in English 1237 GMT 16 Nov 82

[Text] New Delhi, Nov 16 (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand has warned that the developing countries' increasing debts constitute a threat to the entire monetary system of the world.

Mr Mitterrand made the observation in an interview given to the New Delhi-based fortnightly INDIA TODAY on the eve of his visit to India beginning November 27.

He commended the role of Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi in fostering South-South cooperation and for continuing action taken by her toward North-South cooperation.

"The efforts made by France and India go hand in hand," he said. Earlier he recalled his country's decision to increase resources for the International Development Agency (IDA).

Mr Mitterand noted India and France were in a "joint quest for a more just and more stable international economic order." The Franco-Indian dialogue on economic and technical cooperation was based on "equality between the two countries and on a recognition of interdependence and solidarity."

"The ties between our two countries have strengthened considerably especially after Mrs Gandhi's visit to France a year ago," Mr Mitterrand said. Mrs Gandhi visited Paris in November last.

He pointed out both countries were trying toward solving problems which threatened peace.

"India has a genuine non-aligned policy," he said, adding that his own country, though a member of the Western defence alliance, had always kept its position of "independence decision making both in the military and political field."

About his forthcoming Indian tour, he said: "To get to know the Indians better will be an excellent staring point for me."

OFFICER SUGGESTS PERSHING MISSILES FOR FRANCE

PM170801 Paris LE FIGARO in French 15 Nov 82 p 2

[Article by serving French officer under the pseudonym "Brution": "Europe's Defense"]

[Text] In September 1948, a European minister explained his country's policy to the United Nations in the following terms: "The Soviet delegation should not seek complicated explanations for our policy. Do you know what the basis of our policy is? It is fear, fear of you, fear of your government, fear of your policy." A few months later the Washington treaty instituted the Atlantic alliance.

Indeed, Western Europe entered a protectorate to avert the Soviet threat. At that time, it was bankrupt and exhausted and had no choice. But what should have been merely a "temporary situation" according to Chancellor Adenauer, continued: The old continent's security depends more than ever on U.S. good will. However, Western Europe, one of the leading world economic powers, now has the means of ensuring its defense. It is faint-heartedness and lack of political far-sightedness on the part of some leaders which is the sole reason for its abandonment.

SS20 Missiles Aimed at Causing Fear

Now, as in the past, it is still fear which inspires the European countries' foreign policy. Fear of the Soviet armored divisions of course, but — a new factor — fear of no longer being defended by the United States, which is increasingly leaning toward the defense of our continent by conventional weapons alone. As regards the use of tactical nuclear weapons, "as late as possible, but as early as necessary," to cite the tortuous expression used by former Chancellor Schmidt, it is, in fact, admitted that the latter would only come into play to remedy a dangerous situation after the loss of an initial battle.

With that dramatic outlook, the European peoples, in complete disarray, are gradually leaning toward suicidal pacifism: If it can be done gently it is, after all, better to accept Soviet hegemony than risk nuclear war to remain free....

That is the miraculous result which Moscow is busy achieving thanks to the famous SS20 missiles. The word deterrence has been banished from Soviet military vocabulary, which has retained the more offensive concept of "policy of intimidation by terror." That is the aim pursued by the Kremlin, which has realized the extent to which it can benefit from its Eurostrategic missiles.

Mr Brezhnev's evocation of the possibility of a U.S.-Soviet duel, for which our continent would be the battlefield and the SS20 and Pershing II missiles the tools, is a threat to the Europeans. The insidious psychological war waged on the West by Moscow is aimed at creating a state of mind in which the deployment of the U.S. Euromissiles is finally rejected in order to avoid being seen as provocateurs and in which you do not arm in order to avoid the temptation of defending yourself.

U.S. disengagement and capitulation without war are the gloomy prospects facing the old continent unless it gets a grip on itself.

Pershing Missiles in France?

During a foundation of the future colloquim, General Gallois asked an unexpected question: "Why shouldn't France accept Pershing missiles on its territory under the president's authority?"

Such a possibility invoked by General Gallois, who could not be suspected of "Atlanticism," deserves consideration. Would it not ultimately be the best politico-strategic response to Moscow's attempts to destabilize the Atlantic alliance? At the same time, would it not be a move toward a European military force to which France holds the key?

Such a transfer is conceivable provided our country is really delegated use of the weapons which it would possess and provided it plays the role as a strategic link between the United States and Europe within the alliance. Its nuclear power status enables it to do that -- unlike its neighbors -- without having to fear Moscow's blackmail. The Pershing missiles -- and cruise missiles -- appropriately deployed within our national sanctuary, would be protected from a preventive attack which, because of the collateral damage it would be bound to cause, would necessarily lead to reprisals against the Soviet Union's territory. Thus, France could show its determination to participate in Western Europe's defense, starting from the Iron Curtain, with credibility at both the technical and the psychological level.

It is not out of the question that the United States might give our country special guarantees in return. Those guarantees would be bound to strengthen the deterrent which France would enjoy as a sanctuary and link between the two pillars of the free world's defense.

If our country took that initiative, it would have a considerable international effect. The United States would find in it reasons for not giving way to the isolationist temptation felt by some, and our allies would be bound to react against that loss of confidence in themselves and in the old continent's future.

Europe Exorcized

If, as there is every reason to fear, the French Armed Forces are affected by the austerity policy -- there is nothing new under the sun; in difficult periods the democracies have often sacrificed the citizens' future security, out of demagoguery, in favor of their short-term well-being -- the consquences in the European security sphere may be irreversible. How can our allies, especially Germany, be prevented from sliding down the slippery slope if we reduce our defense effort?

Placing a seventh nuclear submarine in service by around 1985 is not likely to make up for the "Redoubtable's "retirement" and the reduction of manpower expected before 1985. That leaves the United States and the Pershing missiles.

To cite Beaumarchais: "When you give way to fear of evil, you already feel the evil of fear." To ensure that Europe does not sink once and for all into "the evil of fear," it must refuse to be a stake for the superpowers. That will take a great deal of time. If Europe is to fulfill its potential, France must help it. Why not Euromissiles operated by French soldiers under French political control to defend Europe? The idea deserves consideration even if -- especially if -- it raises a storm of protest among the Communists, who are clearly less afraid of the SS20 missiles already targeted on us than of the Pershing missiles which they do not want. They hope that the old continent will one day fall into Moscow's sphere of influence without any resistance and that will become the official nomenklatura of one of the USSR's foreign provinces.

PCF'S MARCHAIS VIEWS PRC VISIT, CP RELATIONS

[Report on interview with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais on the Radio Luxembourg-Le Monde Grand Jury Program on 7 November]

[Excerpts] Georges Marchais, our party's secretary general, was the guest on the Radio Luxembourg-Le Monde Grand Jury Program yesterday evening. He answered the questions asked of him by the radio and newspaper journalists.

The first question related to his health, and Georges Marchais replied that he was very well and recalled that he has just had a health check 7 years after his heart attack: "The specialist gave a clear reply when he said: 'he is very well, he can continue to work, he is as fit as a fiddle.' My health is therefore excellent."

Georges Marchais then condemned the "intolerable campaign" waged by the press concerning his health. The aim, he explained, is to exert pressure on the Communists by saying to them: "It is necessary to replace the secretary general. That is a method of political struggle which I do not accept. The campaign does not intimidate me and will not frighten me." Saying that he hopes to retire one day, Georges Marchais concluded on this point by saying: "There are men in the party leadership who are fully qualified to be secretary general."

China: We Are Satisfied

George Marchais then recalled the question on the agenda of his recent visit to China after being asked a question on that subject. "It concerned relations between our party and the CPC. Those relations had not been good for many years. After efforts by both sides, we agreed to meet and resume normal relations. In that sphere, we are extremely satisifed. The decisions lived up to our hopes." Georges Marchais listed the four main axes of those decisions: "1 -- The questions of peace were regarded as central. Our two parties think that disarmanent is the way to progress; 2 -- The answer to the capitalist world's crisis is a change of society, socialism. It is up to each party and each people to determine the type of socialism they want for their country; 3 -- With regard to the Third World, we are agreed on waging a struggle for a new world econmic order; 4 -- Finally, new relations are going to be established between our parties."

"We agree on these four essential questions. We decided on a cooperation plan with which we are very satisfied."

Asked whether the PCF acted as an "intermediary" between the CPC and the CPSU, Georges Marchais said that that was not the delegation's purpose. Then specifying that this question had been discussed, he stressed "a very important thing": The Chinese are still talking of hegemonism as before, "but they now place U.S. hegemonism first." The French and Chinese Communists agree, he said, that "the essential cause of international tension stems from the policy pursued by imperialism, and U.S imperialism in particular." That is true in the Middle East, southern Africa, Central America and Asia, "where the United States is upholding the totally unacceptable thesis of two Chinas."

The CPC, Georges Marchais continued, is also talking of "medium hegemonism," in other words, by "countries serving as a spearhead for the United States to deal their underhand blows," such as Israel. Finally, it is still talking of the USSR's hegemonism," but "in terms which are entirely different from before."

After pointing to the change in the CPC from 1956 to 1982 on questions such as the inevitability of war, the PCF secretary general listed the three issues on which the Chinese reproach the USSR: the latter's aid to Vietnam, the intervention in Afghanistan and border problems.

Shared Responsibility

Then he stressed the thing which strikes him as "essential": In the deterioration of relations with the CPC, "the Chinese Communists and the other communist and workers parties have some responsibility." The criticism which the Chinese are making of what they used to say about peace, the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution "proves us right a priori."

With regard to the ostacizing of the CPC as a result of disagreements, G. Marchais said: "We do not have the right to condemn a party on the pretext that it does not share our opinions."

"It is desirable," he continued, "in the interest of peace, democracy and socialism, that the USSR and China solve their difficulties. The conditions for that exist," he said. "There has been a considerable change among the Chinese Communists, as among us, and there should be such a change elsewhere."

International Solidarity

Questioned on the "reunification of the socialist camp," Georges Marchais recalled that "the PCF has always regarded China as a socialist country" despite the mistake made by ostracizing the CPC.

The term reunification should not be understood in the sense of an international organization or an information bureau. "There is no question," Georges Marchais stressed, "of there being an international organization of communist parties. We are in favor of international solidarity," he added. "International solidarity exists among the rightwing parties. There is a Socialist International. Why should there not be solidarity among the communists"? He then said that it is not out of the question that there might be a "meeting among the communist parties on a limited agenda," but not to draw up a strategy.

Georges Marchais then said that "the Chinese appreciate any state which takes action to promote peace, disarmament, independence and a new world economic order and which condemns the plundering of underdeveloped countries." Having said that, he added, the Chinese party and state leaders want "cooperation in all spheres." He stressed "the vast sphere of possibilities" which such an attitude opens up and expressed the hope that the French Government will seize this opportunity.

Georges Marchais then returned to the development of relations among the various communist parties. He stressed: "Our party, like others, has rejected the theory of a founder-party, a central party, and has greatly encouraged a positive development." With regard to relations between the Chinese and Soviet Communist parties, Georges Marchais recalled that discussions between the two countries are taking place at the state level. He added: "As regards the parties, I cannot tell you anything," and he specified: "If every effort was not made to achieve progress, we would know where the responsibility lies."

The PCE's Setback Upset

Questioned on [PCE Secretary General] Santiago Carrillo's resignation, Georges Marchais replied: "We were very upset by the PCE's election setback.

We were particularly upset because we are aware of its extraordinary role in the struggle against Francoism and the extraordinary sacrifices it made in that struggle."

"We are convinced that the PCE will find within itself the necessary strength to overcome the difficulties it is encountering." As regards Eurocommunism's future, which was called into question by a journalist, Georges Marchais remarked that "it is not dependent on one man or one party." The term itself is "inappropriate." He continued: What we must understand by it is the "search by the communist parties for an original path for building a socialist society corresponding to each people's traditions, needs and aspirations," and taking account of the "far-reaching changes which have come about in our respective countries; and there are communist parties on all continents which are taking action in this same direction."

Questioned on the situation of Shcharanskiy, who is interned in the USSR, Georges Marchais then gave the reply he received to the requests for information which he had made to the Soviet leaders. As regards Shcharanskiy's state of health, there is no reason "to express any concern on that subject." As regards the validity of the sentence, he is a citizen "sentenced for espionage and other serious crimes against the state." In that connection, Georges Marchais cited the remarks made by former President Carter on a senior Soviet official who had served as an intelligence agent for the United States. Then he added: "French prisons also probably contain Frenchmen who worked against their country. We will never confuse the human rights question with that kind of question."

Human Rights

"When you talk of human rights it always concerns the socialist countries," the PCF secretary general then remarked before listing Haiti, Paraguay, Uruguay, Guatemala, Indonesia and the Philippines in which thousands of people are imprisoned, tortured and threatened with death. Who, aside from the communists, talks about the "96 people hanged in South Africa and the 25,000 sentenced in Turkey, which is a NATO member?"

Speaking about Poland, Georges Marchais stated: "We have not changed our position on that subject. We regret the situation which exists in that country, which is the result not of the system but of serious, deep mistakes that have been made, which call for economic, social and democratic reforms. We do not want to wage civil war at the expense of others."

The French Communists' conception has always been that of a "trade union movement independent of the employers, the government and parties," Georges Marchais continued, and, in that connection, he recalled the trip made to the USSR back in 1922 by Pierre Semard and Gaston Monmousseau, stating in substance: "We have an original trade union movement in France, we are attached to it and will defend it...."

Questioned on the meeting with the PS on the commune elections scheduled for Wednesday, George Marchais stressed: "Our objective is union lists throughout the country to support the outgoing mayors.

It would be a mistake to confuse the commune elections with the parliamentary or presidential elections. The mayors have personal popularity. They have won their positions against the right. They have positive administrative records. They constitute the essential weapon against the right."

Georges Marchais cited the example of Communist mayors who in the recent canton elections regained the positions which the PCF had prior to the parliamentary elections.

He stated that it is important not to be narrow-minded. He stressed that in the 1971 commune elections the PCF did not demand that, in drawing up the union lists, account be taken that Jacques Duclos had done much more than Gaston Defferre in the 1969 presidential elections. In 1973, the parliamentary elections placed the communists in the lead in some cities over the socialists. We did not ask to head the list in those cases either.

"It is necessary to chose who is the most effective," he said, "to defeat the right, which wants to make these elections a springboard from which to regain lost positions in order to return to power when the time comes. Therefore, it is necessary to defeat it at any cost and, in order to do that, to return a team behind the outgoing mayor."

PRESIDENT ASKS FANFANI TO FORM GOVERNMENT

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 16 -- Italian head-of-state Sandro Pertini today called on Senate Speaker Amintore [Fanfani], a Christian Democrat who is his deputy in the constitutional hierarchy, to form a new government to replace outgoing Premier Giovanni Spadolini's five-way coalition.

Fanfani had an appointment with Pertini this afternoon to discuss his appointment. The outgoing government, whose life ended Saturday with Spadolini's second resignation in three days, was a coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals, and Republicans. The Senate speaker, a former premier who served as government chief in January 1954, [words indistinct] is one of the most powerful veterans in the ranks of the Christian Democrats.

In an interview published by the latest edition of the weely, OGGI, he said he was ready to attempt forming a five-party government open to a constructive relationship with the Communists the major force on the opposition benches and the Christian Democrats' closest rivals at the polls.

Fanfani's call to the Quirinale presidential residence came earlier than expected, but was seen by many analysts as in the cards. His name started circulating Saturday when, officially just because he was about to go to Moscow to represent Italy at late Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev's funeral, he met with Pertini on the crisis.

Pertini's decision to name the Senate speaker as premier-designate seems to shelve any ideas for a "bridge government" which would hold the fort on a caretaker basis until yearly elections in the spring.

For Fanfani, as for any premier-designate, the problem now is to work out a government platform acceptable to all the partners he tries to draw into a new coalition. Spadolini fell because of deep disagreements on economic policy between Christian Democrat and Socialist ministers, representing the two major pillars of the outgoing government. But all the outgoing partners told Pertini during his consultations yesterday and today that they were ready to enter a new government on the basis of a "clear program" and a "non-provisional solution."

For the Christian Democrats, party Secretary Ciriaco de Mita said today that what is needed is a "government that governs" in solving the country's "dramatic" economic situation.

For the Socialists, their Secretary Bettino Craxi confirmed his party's "commitment to governability", but also warned that, if there was an "unclear solution" or "confusion", the best step would be early elections immediately.

Yesterday, the Republicans once more advanced Spadolini's name, but also said they were in favor of a "program of rigor", while the other two minor parties in the outgoing majority, the Social Democrats and the Liberals, came out for a new five-way partnership based on a "precise and rigorous platform."

For the Communists, party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer said his party is against early elections, but would like to see a "genuine alternative" to Christian Democrat rule.

If Fanfani succeeds in forming a government, it would mean returning to a Christian Democrat premiership, which, with the exception of Spadolini's almost one-and-a-half years at the helm, has been the rule in Italy since just after World War II.

Other opposition parties ranging from the Radicals and the Proletarian Unity Party on the left to the neofascist on the right urged elections at once or in the spring.

Fanfani To Be Premier

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 16 -- Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani this evening agreed to accept the job of premier-designate and seek to stitch together a coalition government to replace the outgoing administration of Giovanni Spadolini.

Meeting with newsmen shortly after taking on the task "with reservations", Fanfani said that the considerable difficulties of the moment obliged him to first undertake a preliminary sounding of the means, procedures, parliamentary cooperation and the general climate for appropriately solving the country's urgent problems.

Fanfani, a veteran Christian Democrat, is, as Senate speaker, second in the constitutional hierarcy after head of state Sandro Pertini. He has already presided over four cabinets: in January 1954, in 1958-59, in 1960-62, and in 1962-63.

One of the most powerful men in the ranks of Christian Democracy, he has served several times as the political secretary. In 1965 he served as chairman of the 20th United Nations Assembly.

GOVERNMENT CANCELS DIPLOMATIC ACTIVITY

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 15 -- Outgoing Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini today cancelled all foreign missions by members of his lame-duck government and also asked other governments to suspend missions or visits to this country unless they are already scheduled meetings at the technical level, without political importance.

The guidelines for what is now just a cabinet handling ordinary administration since Spadolini's resignation Saturday added that Italy will take part with members of the government in NATO and EEC meetings.

In other points, the statement from the prime minister's office made it clear that all government activity will be effectively paralyzed, apart from moves required to prevent expiry of legislative provisions and draft bills already decided.

PARTIES' PRESS COMMENT ON GOVERNMENT CRISIS

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 16 -- With head-of-state Sandro Pertini scheduled to conclude his consultations for the formation of a new government early this afternoon, this morning's editions of the Italian dailies were still uncertain whether to forecast the naming of a new premier-designate to succeed Giovanni Spadolini or the dissolution of Parliament. The crisis broke last Saturday when Spadolini, a Republican, handed his resignation to Pertini for the second time in three days, thus ending his second five-way coalition of the Republicans with the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, and Liberals.

Interviewed by the Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, Spadolini voiced no views on how a new government should be formed, but he said that the "line of rigour is the only one adapted to dealing with the Italian crisis, in awareness of its very close ties with the international economic crisis".

The Rome daily, IL TEMPO, said Pertini might name a premier-designate as early as this evening, and it was also prepared to name those it described as "candidates" -- Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, both of them Christian Democrats, and Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi.

The Italian Communist Party daily, L'UNITA, pointed out that all the hypotheses in circulation are for a new five-party cabinet, describing this as an "absurd attempt to resuscitate an old policy".

Noting that ungovernability in Italy has reached "intolerable limits," the paper said that the situation cannot be faced with "provisional and shabby government solutions".

It also said that the solution should not marked by what analysts on the government side of the fence are describing as "continuity", since "continuity is just ruinous".

The Christian Democrat daily, IL POPOLO, asked for a government with a "serious project to defeat a grave emergency". According to many analyscs, the paper was hinting that party Secretary Ciriaco de Mita will suggest only one name to Pertini: Fanfani.

The Turin daily, LA STAMPA, also spoke of Fanfani as a candidate, but it added that Pertini also had a favourable eye for Colombo.

The Socialist Party daily, AVANTI, argued against "empty and confused political prospects", though it was very prudent about suggesting concrete solutions.

The fact remains that, yesterday, the Socialist steering committee said clearly that the alternative to a confused political perspective would be the "unpostponable and urgent duty of an immediate election".

The Milan daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO, said the two hypotheses were a "term government" to last until next spring when early elections would be held before the constitutional deadline in 1984, or else a government designed to last until the latter date.

According to this newspaper, if the first hypothesis emerges, Craxi would be disposed to leave the premiership to a Christian Democrat, otherwise he wants it for himself-though "the first hypothesis seems to have more foundation".

Playing on the Spanish term, "reaparecidos", the "reappeared" as opposed to the "missing", IL MANIFESTO, the most important voice to the left of the Communists, wondered if the new government would be composed entirely of people who have come back from the darkness.

IL MANIFESTO pointed out that, even though everyone admits the crisis is "very grave", hypothetical solutions making the round include a provisional government, a government for the whole legislature, a broad-based coalition, a narrow coalition, a Christian Democrat or Socialist-led coalition, or a government of national emergency.

"These are the soups being served in the Christian Democrat convent", the paper said. "Get thee away. To the left, he who eats them dies on the spot".

The Rome daily, LA REPUBBLICA, said Fanfani may take on the premier's job now, or Forlani, or Colombo or others might try for a couple of months, "but the prospect of early general elections remains in the background".

L'UNITA Comment

AU170845 Rome ANSA in English 0802 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, 17 November -- The selection of Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani to form a new government to replace th outgoing five-party coalition of Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini is the central topic of the Italian political debate today.

Observers have pointed out that Fanfani will make an all-out effort to form a viable government.

President Sandro Pertini's speedy decision to tap the veteran Christian Democrat politician caught many political observers by surprise, since outgoing Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, also a Christian Democrat, was considered the front-runner for the post.

Official comments by the political parties were scarce. The Socialist Party will make its position known today. The Communist Party mouthpiece "L'UNITA" carries an article in today's issue which says that "the only sure thing is that the Christian Democrats first broiled Spadolini on a spit to the burning point and now show up on the doorstep" of the prime minister's office "with their oldest and most authoritative politician.... as if to say, after Fanfani the only alternative is elections".

Meanwhile, Fanfani will begin consultations today to form the new government. He expects to wind up talks with all the political parties by tomorrow evening.

SPADOLINI INTERVIEWED ON ECONOMY, U.S. EMBARGO

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 16 -- The Italian economic slump is clearly influenced and depends upon the international economic crisis and only a rigorous policy is capable of overcoming this difficult period, according to outgoing Premier Giovanni Spadolini in a lengthy interview published by CORRIERE DELLA SERA today.

He voiced amazement that when he aired this common sense view before the house Friday some of his listeners, including Senator Cesare Merzagora, who is generally friendly towards him, interpreted it as a specific admission of blame on the part of Spadolini and his outgoing administation.

He emphasized that neither Italy nor the government was responsible for America's monetary policy, the pressures exerted by the dollar's strength, or the inflationary thrusts from abroad. "We are a transformation economy which cannot throw up water-tight bulkheads against the outside world", he said.

The Republican Party leader went on to say that Italy's chances of effectively combatting inflation were closely limited by swings in the U.S. interest rates and their repercussions on the exchange market.

Spadolini said he told the house that the hardest sector to rule in a modern society was that of the economy.

The tensions and contradictions caused by the economic crisis on a world level have been felt in all countries, the outgoing premier said. It is "inevitable" that Italy has felt this crisis particularly keenly, he went on. For this reason, Spadolini said he has always called for a rigorous line in dealing with the Italian crisis, aware of the close ties it has with the international economic crisis.

The Republican leader also showed the CORRIERE journalist a letter he received from U.S. President Ronald Reagan after the Italian premier had made an official visit to Washington. In it Reagan announced that he had lifted the embargo halting shipments of American machinery to "Nuovo Pignone" of Florence, needed for the Siberian gas pipeline.

Spadolini noted that the letter was dated November 13 and reached him 2 hours before he went to the Quirinale to reconfirm his resignation to head of state Sandro Pertini. "I was the first to bring the letter to the president of the republic, whose trip to America last spring opened the way for the broad political and even psychological consensus that emerged. Even President Pertini was very pleased," he said.

Referring to Italy's participation in the pipeline, Spadolini said he had not asked for Reagan's consensus but merely stressed that Italy reserved its right to freedom of action with regard to all contracts stipulated prior to the sanctions. These sanctions were applied by the U.S. after martial rule was imposed in Poland on December 13.

FAMILIES OF MISSING IN ARGENTINA MAKE DEMANDS

[Text] (ANSA) -- Milan, November 16 -- Argentina's military rulers should be made to appear before an international court to answer to the "crimes committed against humanity", according to members of the families of some of the estimated three hundred Italians by birth or origin who disappeared in Argentina during the nation's "dirty war" on terrorism in the 1970's. The family members were brought together here Monday for a press conference organized by the Italian League for Rights and the Liberation of Peoples.

Addressing himself to the issue of the thousands of people missing in the South American country and the recent discovery of mass graves around Buenos Aires, a spokesman for the group declared, "all nations, Italy included, should shoulder responsibility for what has happened and is happening in Argentina. Crimes against humanity have been committed and the civilized world must act to bring Argentina's military rulers before an international tribunal. "We demand that for the crimes of the military junta, a trial like that at Nuremberg be held", the spokesman said.

The members of the families, exiles and members of the Italian League then called on the Rome government to file suit against the Buenos Aires government in connection with the recent discovery of the unmarked graves and to send a parliamentary delegation to the country to pressure the junta. After the presentation of a dossier containing direct testimony of the many requests made by the league over the years to members of Parliament and the government, the spokesman said, "Not one concrete step was taken despite the fact that all this was well known to the government".

Mission To Pay Visit

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, 17 November -- A delegation of Italian M.P.'s representing all the political parties will soon go to Argentina on a fact-finding mission on the conditions of the Italian community in the Latin American nation and particularly the problem of the hundreds, perhaps thousands, of "desaparecidos"or missing under the military junta's rule since 1976.

The decision to send the delegation was reached unanimously Tuesday evening by the Emigration Committee of the lower house Foreign Affairs Commission. The delegation will probably be in Argentina in early December, before the summer holidays begin in the southern hemisphere.

PRINCIPAL PARTIES CRITICIZE EANES ADDRESS

[Unattributed report: "Parties Disagree With Eanes' Address"]

[Excerpt] The principal political parties have issued analyses of the president of the republic's address to the nation, all of them expressing not always coinciding disagreements, although some welcome certain aspects with particular emphasis. The Socialist Party [PSP] -- which adopts the toughest stance, going so far as to suggest to the president of the republic that he resign -- criticizes Eanes' attitude toward the revision of the Constitution and his lack of "political courage" to dismiss the government. The Social Democratic Party [PSD] and the Social Democratic Central Party [CDS] concentrate, of course, on the aspect mentioned primarily by the PSP -- that is, the way in which the current constitutional system was dealt with. The PCP and the Portuguese Democratic Movement agree with the president of the republic as regards the revision and -- like the PSP -- express disappointment at the failure to dismiss the government.

PSD: 'Offensive to Entire Parliament'

"The president of the republic's disapproving judgement of the way in which the revision of the Constitution took place, attributing to it an image of secretiveness and a shady party deal, is offensive to the entire Parliament," the PSD emphasizes in a communique in which it rejects that judgement and regrets that "this stance identifies with the PCP's criticisms."

The Social Democrats believe that "the revision of the Constitution did not create new and greater responsibilities for the parties alone," since "the new institutional period and the country's grave economic situation require that the president of the republic, too, and not the parties, government and Parliament alone, shoulder the historic responsibility of a concentrated ["concentrada" -- possibly misprint for "concertada" -- "aggreed"] way of life which will enhance the democratic system."

Referring to the president of the republic's stance on the constitutional court, the PSD says that "this court's political image requires of the country's most senior leaders a word of respect and a gesture of confidence in this new state body's potential," thereby regretting that "the president of the republic should immediately corrode that image."

While agreeing with the interpretation of the president's powers as regards the dismissal of the government and dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic, the PSD believes, however, that it has not been clarified whether the president of the republic "does or does not indeed act as a factor for democratic stability."

It adds that "it is easy to beckon to public opinion with the image of disenchantment in the context of the international and internal situation which is being experienced, but it does not seem correct to do so without gauging the consequences which this could entail at the level of the citizens' democratic participation in community life, in joint actions and in elections themselves."

Last, the PSD asserts that "the future will not be built on the basis of conflict with the democratic parties and on the presumption that they will fail." To contribute to this "is to contribute to a lack of solutions for the country's democratization and development."

PSP: 'Eanes Should Resign'

"If the president of the republic is in open conflict with the revised Constitution, he should resign, as, he indeed announced that he would do though his spokesman," the PSP Political Committee's standing committee asserts in a communique after "regretting" that the president of the republic, "the guarantor of the institutions' functioning, has launched an attack on the constitutional system, to which he is bound by solemn oath, after promulgating the law on the revision of the Constitution."

Next, the PSP criticizes the president of the republic "for not having the political courage to dismiss the government or dissolve the Assembly of the Republic when he explicitly acknowledges in his address that he possessed and still possesses those powers," observing in this connection that "it is not for a president of the republic who was elected as an independent to be an alternative, lead or encourage party blueprints, or replace the Portuguese people in the assessment of the political alternatives which are determined and affirmed under democracy through the ballot box alone." It recalls the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic "at Sa Carneiro's request," and states that Eanes "now seems intent, in contradiction to the expectations of the electorate who elected him, on preventing the affirmation of a democratic leftwing alternative."

In addition, the Socialists are surprised by "the fact that the president of the republic has used in his criticisms of the process of revising the Constitution the PCP's guidelines of analysis"; an attitude which is "all the graver since Ramalho Eanes has made public statements on various occasions favorable to the revision of the Constitution and undertook in his repeat candidacy to work to secure broadened agreements in favor of its realization."

Next they mention "the president of the republic's negative attitude toward the existing political parties (with the sole exception of the PCP), which takes on particular gravity at preelection time, as well as the strange defense of independents and the formation of nebulous political groupings, such as perhaps the mucb publicized 'presidential party.'" They emphasize that in "brandishing the threat of a more stringent use of the right of veto against the government's actions," without having "the political courage to dismiss it," and in "concentrating the attack on the democratic opposition's alternative ability through the ridiculous attempt to bracket the PSP with the Democratic Alliance majority," the president of the republic is "deeply distorting the nature of his constitutional functions and mandate" and "making the democratic system unworkable."

In conclusion, the PSP Standing Committee "regrets" that "the democratic hopes pinned on this address to the nation have been totally disappointed," since the president of the republic "not only did not act against the disaster of the Democratic Alliance government, but because entagled in an incomprehensible web of confused, subjective and superificial arguments in which personal resentment and not a responsible and genuinely democratic state perspective predominated."

CDS: 'Negative and Inopportune'

In a communique from its Executive Committee, the CDS says that it is "negative and inopportune" that Ramalho Eanes has "chosen this moment" to "criticize the revision of the Constitution."

After recalling that the president of the republic demanded during his first term of office a "stable and coherent" majority, and, when this was secured by the Democratic Alliance, distanced himself from it, the CDS points out that the same thing happened with the revision of the Constitution despite its having been effected with the two-thirds majority demanded by Eanes on his reelection.

The centrists stress that the president's address was "a declaration of deadlock," specifying: "On the one hand, in the president's opinion, everything is bad. However, on the other, in his opinion, there is no solution. Now this is not what the country expects and deserves from a responsible statement by the president of the republic. The country expects institutional cooperation, determination and hope. It does not expect lamentations, 'deadlocks' or frustrations."

The Christian Democrats also deny that the president of the republic can distance himself from the government in the economic field, and recall obstructions by Eanes and the Council of the Revolution to measures decided on by the Democratic Alliance government, while expressing concern at the president's reference to greater stringency in exercising the veto.

'Did Not Come Up to Expectations'

In one respect, the president of the republic's address "does not come up to the expectations of the millions of Portuguese people, who have long been demanding the dismissal of the Democratic Alliance government, the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic, the formation of a caretaker government and the holding of early legislative elections," the PCP information and propaganda section maintains in a communique.

As regards the aspect indicated, the PCP believes that as "it has persistently asserted," "the revision of the Constitution itself and the Democratic Alliance government's policy long ago justified the president of the republic's adoption, within the sphere of his powers, of measures to oust the Democratic Alliance from power and give the Portuguese people the opportunity to choose new leaders through a democratic election."

As for the rest, the PCF believes that the president of the republic "undertook a very critical and correct analysis of the revision of the Constitution, its significance and its aims." The communique states that "the PCP has repeatedly expressed the same criticisms and warned about the dangers to democracy stemming from the revision of the Constitution imposed by the Democratic Alliance-PSP agreement."

CDS' Amaral Scores Address

[Unattributed report: "Fewer Powers for President of Republic Because of Eanes"]

[Text] Freitas do Amaral explained yesterday to young centrists assembled at their national meeting that the revision of the Constitution envisaged "a slight reduction in the president's powers" because of General Ramalho Eanes' conduct. The Social Democratic Center Party Leader was speaking at the closing session in a Lisbon hotel, having accused the president of the republic of granting support to no constitutional government except the Nobre Da Costa and Lurdes Pintasilgo governments, which were, he said, "apparently much to General Eanes' liking."

In the introduction to the section of his speech which constitutes a direct reply to Eanes' address to the nation, Freitas do Amaral said that "the national political situation is currently dominated by the great democratic victory achieved with the revision of the Constitution and by the lamentations of those who rightly perceive and view it as the defeat of their personal and party plans."

Freitas do Amaral commented that "it is not surprising that all real democrats feel happy and identify with the revision of the Constitution which has been effected," and that "it is not surprising, too, that the nondemocrats -- the PCP, the Portuguese Democratic Movement, the Popular Democratic Union, the Council of the Revolution and the mainland or island extreme right -- have always been opposed to this revision of the Constitution."

"What causes surprise -- at least for those who still had any illusions -- is that the president of the republic has placed himself decidedly on the side of the extreme right and left and against all the democratic parties represented in the Assembly of the Republic," the centrist leader continued. "What causes astonishment -- at least for those who still had any doubts -- is that the president of the republic has harshly criticized the new text of the Constitution when he was never heard to make the slightest criticism of the legal and political monstrosity of the 1976 Constitution. What causes indignation -- at least for those who still had any hope -- is that the president of the republic has so bitterly regretted a slight reduction of the president's powers -- which, moreover, he rarely used -- while simultaneously refusing to welcome the end of the period of transition, the replacement of revolutionary legitimacy by democratic legitimacy and the final abolition of the Council of the Revolution."

Next, the deputy premier asked: "Does the president of the republic complain that the composition of the constitutional court has not been regulated better? Does he complain that the new text leaves little political room for independents? Does he complain that the president of the republic has lost powers and that the parliamentary element of the system has been accentuated?" and he replied, "but General Ramalho Eanes is responsible for all this. If his conduct were normal, his political career free from tortuosities, his relationship with the parties sound and positive, his esteem for independents and his condemnation of presidential parties clear and without reservations, his acceptance of the semipresidentialist model frank and unreserved, his relationship with Parliament and with governments normal and straightforward and his support for the executive power, appointed by the free people, constant and solid, the revision of the Constitution could perhaps have been different in some respects."

Would Be Certain to Flunk

The alleged lack of support for the constitutional governments was later detailed by Freitas do Amaral, who mentioned the 25 April speechs during the first two governments' terms of office, The "abandonment" to which Mota Pinto was allegedly consigned, The "active hostility" against the Sa Carneiro government and "the attacks on the current government."

He analyzed the comments which the president of the republic made on the new arrangement of powers, scoffing: "We heard such mistakes and distorted concept's about the constitutional powers to dismiss the government and dissolve the Assembly of the Republic and, had they come from a student instead of from a president, he would be certain to flunk."

Freitas do Amaral then sought to rebut, point by point, the line of argument put forward by Eanes. At the end of the analysis, he commented: "Farewell to political stability, farewell to governmental continuty, farewell to elections every 4 years. With the bizarre concept that has now been created, no government or majority will ever again be able to have the guarantee that, barring a grave crisis, they will fully carry out their term of office to the end. Is this what Ramalho Eanes regards as ensuring the democratic institutions' normal functioning?"

The centrist leader also asked: "Perhaps it will be worthwhile now to ask the president of the republic whether his dismissal in midterm would also be considered politically justified, provided there were clear signs that another citizen could receive more votes than the president in office in a new election...."

Last, Freitas do Amaral asserted that "the president of the republic gives nobody security and confidence. He disagrees with the government's conduct but does not dismiss it; he keeps in in office but does not support it; he criticizes it for not implementing radical reforms but announces that he will veto them when they reach him," and he concluded: "Sa Carneiro was right: Our country will only sail ahead when Ramalho Eanes leaves Belem Palace."

PSD Criticizes Eanes, PCP

[Unattributed report: "PSD Hints at Toughening Relations With President"]

[Excerpt] The Social Democratic Party [PSD] National Council, which met until 0430 yesterday morning in a Cascais hotel, believes that President Eanes has not behaved as a head of state, and so "should be confronted with the alternative of acting" as president of all the Portuguese people "or conferring himself to being the successor to the defunct Council of the Revolution." If he opts for the latter hypothesis, "the PSD, with the likely support of all the democratic forces, would find itself forced to change its strategy and clearly accept the institutional conflict provoked by the president of the republic,with inevitable consequences as regards the conduct of the government and of the parliamentary group in the Assembly of the Republic."

In a communique issued at the end of the meeting, the PSD National Council, after mentioning "the statements made by the president of the republic over the last few months, the threat of regular recourse to the veto and the inability to cooperate in motivating the Portuguese people to tackle and surmount the international and national economic crisis," stresses that, "in a view of the importance of the tasks to be performed, the attitude of anybody who seeks to hamper everything and wishes to cooperate in nothing is incompatible with the national interest."

Referring to the PCP, it states that "it should accept or, if it does not accept voluntarily, be forced to observe the democratic rules, even if, as seems to be the case, it does not like them." It adds that the PCP, "defeated in the revision of the Constitution and in the attempts at general strikes," is now seeking "to change tactics and involve itself in localized guerrilla warefare, as has already happened in the Portuguese Electric Power Company, Lisnave Shipyard and iron and steel." It also condemns "the acts of sabotage and sit-downs instigated by the communists, which should be punished in accordance with the law."

On the other hand, it emphasized that "sectors described as rightwing, which are using news media said to be supporters of the Democratic Alliance, should be denounced more frequently as directly responsible for campaigns of destabilization aimed at a return to the dictatorial period."

Strengthening of Democratic Alliance's Cohesion and Consistency

Next, the Social Democrats assert that the Democratic Alliance "will have to strengthen its cohesion and consistency and immediately end any real or apparent splits which could call into question the mandate received from the electorate in 1979 and 1980," stating: "It is not we who will call into question the Democratic Alliance, and for that very reason we will not relinquish our position as majority party within the coalition and the blueprint for changing society which it is seeking to implement."

The PSD, "as the largest Portuguese party and as the largest party in power," believes that "once the revision of the Consitution has been completed and the two principal complementary laws have been approved in the assembly -- also by two thirds of the votes -- there is no time to be lost in making progress and recovering in the economic and social fields." It points out in this connection that "it is precisely in times of greatest difficulties such as we are experiencing that Social Democracy becomes more necessary and applicable to prevent the workers sacrificing themselves for other people."

Within this context, it regards as "imperative" the adoption of measures to "contain the public deficit and the foreign debt," as well as to "rationalize the economic system."

Concerning the local authorities, it expresses the conviction that the 12 December [election] results "will be proof of the PSD's standing."

KIPRIANOU MEETS CANADIAN ENVOY, MAKES STATEMENT

[Text] President Kiprianou has stressed that there can be no progress for a solution to the Cyprus issue if Turkey insists on the policy of division, and it is absolutely necessary, a question of dire need, for the occupation troops to withdraw from Cyprus and for a new decisive effort to be exerted for a fair and lasting solution of the Cyprus problem in accordance with UN resolutions.

In accepting the credentials of new Canadian High Commissioner Vernon George Turner, President Kiprianou also stressed that in reality, the Cyprus issue is not the complicated problem many have tried to portray it as. He added that only if it is approached in its simplicity will there be progress. Mr Kiprianou expressed deep appreciation for Canada's participation in the UN Peace Force in Cyprus and praised the friendly Cypriot-Canadian relations. He also said that while in Moscow yesterday, he invited Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau to visit Cyprus, and expressed the hope that the visit will take place.

While presenting his credentials, the new Canadian high commissioner also referred to his country's close friendship and ties with Cyprus, and stressed that Canada follows with interest and concern the development of the situation in Cyprus. He also said Canada's firm conviction is that a settlement of the Cyprus issue can be better achieved with the United Nations' help.

AKEL-PALESTINIAN COMMUNIST PARTY COMMUNIQUE

NC170920 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 17 Nov 82 pp 1, 7

[Joint AKEL-Palestinian Communist Party communique issued in Nicosia -- date not given]

[Text] At the invitation of Akel's Central Committee, Comrade Na'im 'Abbas Ashhab, member of the Political Bureau of the Palestinian Communist Party, visited Cyprus from 10 to 13 November.

During his stay, Comrade Ashhab was received by AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou and had talks at the party's International Section with Comrade Dhonis Khristofinis, member of the Political Bureau of AKEL's Central Committee and chief of the International Section; with Comrade Mikhalis Olimbios, member of AKEL's Central Committee and alternate chief of the International Section; and with Khristoforos Ioannidhis, member of AKEL's Central Committee and member of the International Section.

During the talks which were conducted in comradely cordiality, there was a mutual briefing on the two brother parties and the struggles of the Palestinian and Cypriot peoples against imperialism, Zionism and reaction in the area. Talks were also conducted and views exchanged on international issues such as the problem of maintaining world peace and the dangers arising from aggressive actions by imperialism and its organs.

Comrade Ashhab informed AKEL's delegation of the latest developments in the Palestinian problem and the ongoing struggle of the Palestinian people, headed by the Palestinian Liberation Organization [PLO]. He especially emphasized the situation and the struggle of the Palestinians in the occupied territories against the oppressive and other actions of the reactionary Zionist Israeli conquerors and the more complicated situation created for the Palestinian and, more generally, the Arab struggle.

AKEL's delegation expressed the wholehearted sympathy, unlimited support and solidarity of the party and the democratic Cypriot people toward the struggle of the Palestinians and the other Arab peoples for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all occupied Arab lands, for the return of the refugees and for the establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state on the land of their forefathers under the leadership of the PLO.

Dhonis Khristofinis informed the representative of the Palestinian Communist Party of the current situation in Cyprus, the developments in the Cyprus issue, of the goals of the imperialists and their organs as well as of the importance of next February's presidential election.

The representative of the Palestinian Communist Party expressed the full sympathy, unlimited support, and solidarity of the party and the Palestinian people toward the struggle of AKEL and the Cypriot people for freeing themselves from the results of the coup and invasion and for a solution to the Cyprus issue within the framework of the United Nations on the basis of the UN resolutions and Makarios-Denktas and the Kiprianou-Denktas agreements, which will guarantee the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and nonaligned character of the Republic of Cyprus.

Also, for the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation and all other foreign troops, for the abolition of foreign military bases and installations, and for full demilitarization of the island. He also supported the demand for the return of refugees to their homes; for an investigation into the fate of missing persons; and for the democratic progress in Cyprus to the benefit of the Cypriot people as a whole.

Both sides underlined the importance of the struggle of the two peoples against common enemies with the support of common friends, the identity of goals and aspirations and their mutual relationship. A consensus of views was also noted on other serious international problems.

Both sides expressed their pleasure and satisfaction over the brotherly ties and relations between the two parties and peoples of Cyprus and Palestine and declared their preparedness to work toward the further strengthening of cooperation and mutual support.

PAPANDREOU RETURNS FROM MOSCOW 16 NOVEMBER

Statement on Moscow Contacts

[Text] I am returning with the hope that a new page might open in the march of mankind because I really ought to admit that the return to the cold war has already created an existential danger. This was stressed by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou, who returned from Moscow at noon today, where he attended Leonid Brezhnev's funeral. Speaking to newsmen immediately after his arrival at the airport, the prime minister said:

[Begin recording] Returning from Moscow, I would like to say some, rather a few, things because I see that the press has already covered many aspects of the visit. Of course, I have fulfilled a sad duty in attending with our delegation the funeral of Leonid Brezhnev, a man who has really been famous through his struggle for detente, disarmament and peace. I have also ascertained the great love and respect that the Soviet people have always had for the deceased president.

I also had the opportunity to meet the new [Soviet] leadership and I have availed myself of the truly important opportunity to have a talk with Mr Tikhonov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, who will be visiting Greece at the beginning of 1983, as soon as the necessary preparations are completed by the various departments so that his visit may be completely fruitful.

Of course, on the occasion of my presence in Moscow — where one can say the world's political leaders were present — important opportunities were provided for an exchange of views on either bilateral matters or issues concerning the international situation, the dangers encompassed in the international situation and desirable activities.

I would say that particularly important were my talks with General Jaruzelski as well as with Fidel Castro and with the UN secretary general. Of course, in addition to these specific meetings and discussions, I had also the opportunity to exchange thoughts with French Premier Mauroy and with U.S. Secretary of State Shultz.

I am returning with the hope that some new page might open in the march of mankind because I really ought to admit that the return to the cold war has already created an existential danger for mankind. It might be one of the Europeans' primary concerns that we contribute to detente, nuclear disarmament and consolidate peace before it is too late.

I could refer to my discussions with Mr Jaruzelski. The basic contents concerned the West European stand toward Poland; the so-called sanctions as well as the prospect in sight for a return to normality in Poland. I can also say it was a sincere and very interesting conversation.

With Fidel Castro, we talked about the fate of the Third World — the really large and aggravating world economic crisis and the dangers contained in this crisis — as well as specifically about the Cyprus issue for which, I can gladly say, he has undertaken concrete initiatives within the framework of both the nonaligned countries and the Eastern bloc.

Also, the main topic of my discussion with the UN secretary general was Cyprus and, of course, the fate of the [UN] organization itself and its role, which must be strengthened so that it may contribute, at this difficult time, as it should in checking the course toward the cold war and return to detente. The Cyprus issue, of course, played an important role in our discussions.

Finally, I must say that the discussion with Mr Tikhonov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, was exceptionally important and interesting and revolved both around our bilateral relations and the more general atmosphere in Europe as well as around the possibilities that should open for the consolidation of peace in the region -- not only in Europe but also on a worldwide scale.

Of course, I should say that on the sidelines of this visit I also exchanged views with other -- known to you -- political leaders who have visited our country, such as Yasir 'Arafat, and it was a really important contact, I would say, between the Greek prime minister and his counterparts in not only European but also other world countries.

I am returning really spiritually strengthened from the prevailing atmosphere I found and, without exaggeration, I must say that Greece -- its actions, course and decisions -- are given a very serious consideration by the world's political leadership. We have a voice and we must use it with wisdom, prudence but also with courage in order to serve the interests of our own people as well as the more general interests of people in Europe, mainly, and beyond Europe. [end recording]

Tikhonov, Shultz Meetings

[Excerpt] Answering a question on his meeting with Mr Tikhonov, Mr Papandreou said: With the chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers we discussed bilateral issues as well as questions concerning nuclear arms, the progress of nuclear disarmaments and their consequences. Of course, we also referred to the major question of Cyprus but we had a rather limited schedule. The very fact that the chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers gave me half an hour on the day of Leonid Brezhnev's funeral shows the friendly disposition he has toward us as well as the importance he attaches to our bilateral relations.

In answer to a question on his meeting with the U.S. secretary of state, Mr Papandreou said: Mr Shultz implied that we will meet in the future. However, the date has not been fixed. Therefore, I prefer not to be specific because I do not know. At any rate, it is clear that there is the intention for a visit. This is how I would place the matter.

Finally, Mr Papandreou said he had the opportunity to speak briefly with CPSU General Secretary Andropov but, as he put it, it was not a discussion of substance. He also had a very brief meeting with U.S. Vice President Bush.

PAPANDREOU MESSAGE ON POLYTECHNIC ANNIVERSARY

["Text" of message by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou -- read by announcer]

[Text] Today, 9 years ago, the Polytechnic became the supreme symbol of our youth's and our entire people's resistance against the tyranny that was guided by foreigners; it became a symbol of democracy, people's sovereignty and national independence.

The Polytechnic lives and will live forever in our hearts and will guide our steps and efforts to consolidate and deepen democracy, for a free and socialist society, for a Greece that will belong to Greeks. The road opened by November [1973 student uprising] is the road of democracy, national independence and change. Now the struggle is equally critical and decisive in vindicating the sacrifices of the Polytechnic fighters; in meeting the expectations of all the underprivileged; in safeguarding our sovereign rights on land, in the air and at sea; in defending our national independence and security, and in building the new Greece of social justice.

The sacrifice of the Polytechnic martyrs, the blood shed on the steps of this contemporary Mesolongion of our history do not belong to one group or one political faction; they are the sacrifice and blood of the Greek youth and of the entire democratic people; they are the steel links of the people's unity that constitute a condition for the survival of the nation and democracy. Honor and glory to the heroic fighters and the immortal dead of the Polytechnic; honor and glory to the road charted by November that, through difficult circumstances, illuminates and guides our steps.

NEGOTIATIONS ON U.S. BASES RECESS UNTIL 8 DEC

These talks, a series of eight [meetings] opened 27 October and were of an exploratory nature for both sides. Participating in the meetings were Deputy Foreign Minister Ioannis Kapsis and Mr Bartholomew, each accompanied by one aide. Mr Bartholomew is expected back in Athens on 6 December and the negotiations will resume on 8 December. A new brief recess in negotiations will take place during the Christmas and New Year holidays at the U.S. negotiator's personal request.

According to press reports, the Greek Government outlined its views on the question of the bases in an explicit, categorical and substantiated manner and requested clarifications from the U.S. side. So, at this time, the U.S. side is aware of all that the Greek Government considers essential for the continuation of the negotiations.

According to the same press reports, the Greek government firmly maintains its views as formulated by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and his competent associates. It should be noted that the Greek side is awaiting for the development of the negotiations without making any comment but, nevertheless, within a framework of optimism for our foreign policy in general.

I KATHIMERINI ON TURKISH NOTE, MAP ON AEGEAN

[Text] As it emerges from Ankara's stance -- which did not do much to implement the principles of the agreement, but escalated provocations at all levels -- the future of the moratorium between Greece and Turkey is uncertain. The submission of a map of the Aegean to a UN service in which this Greek sea appears partitioned with certain maritime jurisdictions divided equally between the two countries is noted as a recent and most provocative act. This particular act -- in conjunction with the repeated airspace violations in recent months and Turkey's imposition on NATO of its views on the Limnos issue -- has by all indications provoked a reaction from the Greek Government, which thus far has stretched the limits of good will by downplaying Turkish provocations.

This position, and the absence of any briefing of public opinion certainly contributed to the surprise of the Greek people over the Greek Government's recent reaction, regardless of whether this was necessary -- according to the official opposition, it was for internal consumption to divert public opinion from the displeasure caused by the government's inability to deal specifically with economic problems.

According to exclusive I KATHIMERINI reports, an undivulged but obviously provocative Turkish act was recently noted when Ankara submitted to the UN International Maritime Organization [IMCO] a map showing a partitioned Aegean claiming equal rights with Greece in responsibility for providing search and rescue services to seamen.

At the same time, in a relevant document, Ankara claims that the points dividing the Aegean in two do not define the boundaries of Turkey's responsibility for "search and rescue" but give a general picture of its facilities and possibilities, and that, should it become necessary, these Turkish facilities (that is, its responsibilities) can be extended even further.

Finally, within the framework of an apparent effort to broaden the points of difference with Greece, it proposes to the responsible UN organization that it is ready to begin talks with the interested states on these issues of "search and rescue."

Following immediate and effective acts by the Ministry of Merchant Marine in cooperation with the Foreign Ministry, our country submitted to the secretary general of the International Maritime Organization an aide-memoire in which (A) Greece rejects the contents of the Turkish note and attached Aegean map; and (B) stresses that our country "has very well organized services, suitable modern means and facilities on land, at sea and on the islands with which it has implemented and coordinated 'search and rescue' operations in an absolutely effective way for very many years in the area of the Athens Flight Information Region, the eastern part of which includes a significant part of the Greek state."

Despite the fact that the Greek Government -- within the framework of protecting the "moratorium" from extensive publicity that would reveal the new Turkish violation -- avoided announcing this new Ankara initiative, it now seems that following the tone the prime minister gave to his statements, simultaneously defining from where the "existent national danger" emanated, the validity of the "moratorium" is in danger.

This is the conclusion which diplomatic observers have reached, taking into consideration the following:

1. The Greek Government had the idea for a moratorium which would allow the creation of a suitable atmosphere so that a Greek-Turkish dialogue could be held that could produce some results. After the prime minister's clear statements, it is difficult to believe that by avoiding provocative statements, the Turkish side will be able to maintain the validity of a "moratorium" which has already lasted a few more months due more to the Greek conciliatory attitude and good faith than to Turkey's compliance with the decisions agreed upon.

2. The Turkish side had always given the impression that it was seeking a pretext for disengaging from the "agreement-moratorium." After all, it was for this reason that Ankara never wanted to admit that the agreement was a "moratorium," the basic element of which is a time period during which states must avoid provocative acts. "The word moratorium does not exist in the Turkish vocabulary," Turkmen had said in an interview after the Ottawa meeting. "Our understanding from what we have agreed upon with the Greeks is that both sides should make an effort to create an atmosphere of mutual trust."

However, "the case of Limnos" does not seem to predetermine that the "moratorium" has come to an end. The case reveals two goals of the PASOK government; one at the foreign and the other at the domestic level. As diplomatic circles conclude, in principle the government's philosophy has begun to be formed by the belief that although a dialogue is useful for the solution of differences, the settlement of problems "at their source" is more useful and effective. The problem of operational control in the Aegean, as manifested recently, although indirectly, through the cancellation of the NATO exercise, is a difference between Greece and Turkey that can be solved only within the alliance's ranks.

A demilitarized Greek island in this area of the Aegean could be used by the Turks as an argument for limiting Greek possibilities for defending an area Turkey claims without legal support.

After all, as authoritative government circles have stressed, "Ankara's insistence on the Limnos issue should be explained by its objective of having no Greek defense system on our islands, thus extending the validity of the idea of a defense cover of the Aegean within the NATO framework by Greek and Turkish defense means on the Turkish and continental Greece coasts, resulting in a defense partitioning of the Aegean, which in Turkish plans would predetermine future bilateral settlement."

The government's decision to have the prime minister take up the issue that has been created at the NATO summit meeting can be included in the framework of foreign goals. It is a resolution, which according to all indications, aims at sounding out the Atlantic alliance's intentions, especially those of the United States while Greek-U.S. talks on the bases are going on. This is so because by linking the issue of the guarantees to the settlement of outstanding NATO issues, the Greek Government wants to ascertain what developments there are in these issues so that it may correspondingly define its stance toward the United States since, as has been reported in the past, the Greek Government would be prepared to "facilitate" the United States as regards some of its critical interests in exchange for the satisfying of certain serious Greek demands -- a fact that would predetermine, in a way, the solution of basic Greek-Turkish differences.

As opposition circles have observed, the goals "of domestic expediency" are included in the government's effort to turn public opinion's interest to other than internal economic and social issues which, as Papakonstandinou noted the day before yesterday, are attaining dramatic dimensions.

It is not encouraging that A. Papandreou has so emphatically stressed the dispute over our sovereign rights on Limnos ("we give nobody the right to define what area of the country we shall defend") when, as New Democracy accurately observed, the issue does not lie there but in Turkey's questioning of Greece's right to fortify Limnos, deliberately misinterpreting the Montreux treaty.

PAPER ACCUSES 'ANKARA JUNTA' OF INCITING TENSION

[From the "Radical" column: "Who Is Inciting Tension?"]

[Text] The intention of Evren's junta to aggravate the tension in Greek-Turkish relations is obvious. Defusing the situation in the Aegean and gradually restoring detente in the Athens-Ankara relations obviously do not favor the U.S. and NATO cold war plans because something like this would limit their role as arbitrators as well as the possibilities for involvement and pressure in both countries. At this time, obeying its master's voice, Evren's junta came through with the Turkmen-Akiman statements the other day to pour "oil on the fire." In a provocative manner, the two Ankara officials question our country's inalienable national rights in Limnos and the other islands in the eastern Aegean, enjoying the open support of NATO and the United States. In their statements, they deny the Greek prime minister the right to visit Limnos and Lesvos. It is self-evident that the Ankara junta would not dare make such impudent claims — in combination with submitting a map to the UN international maritime organization claiming rights in half of the Aegean — if it did not have the open instigation and support of the U.S.-NATO imperialists. The Luns-Rogers "directive," which regards Limnos and the eastern Aegean islands as a "disputable area," emboldens the Ankara junta. Mr Papandreou has repeatedly justified Greece's remaining within NATO by means of the so-called Athens-Ankara-NATO or Athens-Ankara-Washington "triangular relations." The recent categorical refusal of NATO to accept the inclusion of Limnos in the "Apex Express 82" maneuvers -- which clearly means questioning Greek sovereignty over this island -- in conjunction with the provocative statements by Turkmen and Akiman, once again confirm that so long as there is this vicious circle of "triangular relations," the props will also remain for an open intervention and the undermining of our national sovereignty and independence by the U.S.-NATO imperialists. The true safeguarding of our national independence and the country's sovereignty are inconceivable and impossible so long as the country remains in the wolfpack of NATO and preserves the deadly bases.

EEC TO FINANCE SOVIET GAS PIPELINE TO GREECE

[Text] The EEC will most probably finance the construction of a branch of the Soviet gas pipeline to Greece through Bulgaria and Romania. This was stated today by Minister for Energy and Natural Resources Evangelos Kouloumbis after his return from Brussels where he had participated in the EEC Ministerial Council. As was ascertained during the work of the council, on the more general issue of the pipeline, the EEC appears solid and unyielding toward the United States. There are reports that U.S. reservations over the construction of the pipeline will be eliminated shortly. Kouloumbis also mentioned that our country will most probably receive aid from the Community for significant energy projects such as the production of gas from lignite and the production of electricity from geothermal sources and solar energy.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON BUDGET, NATO, GREECE, CYPRUS

[Text] Ankara, 16 Nov (AA) -- Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken said Turkey had no designs on the territory of any nation, adding, however, she would not cede an inch of her territory to anybody either. Bayulken made the statement during the Consultative Assembly debate on the defense budget for 1983. Noting the defense budget constituted 17.3 percent of the total, Bayulken said the principal aim of defense policy was to raise the combat-readiness of the Armed Forces to the maximum, both through foreign aid but also through developing domestic industry.

NATO

Despite her known difficulties, Turkey is trying to fulfill her commitments to NATO, while benefitting from the alliance's strength and deterrent power, Bayulken said. As an element of balance in the Middle East, and in view of the large proportion of GNP she sets aside for defense, it was normal for Turkey to receive more military aid than some other allies. Turkey still believes and informs her allies that all disputes can and should be settled through negotiations, in good will, Bayulken reiterated.

Greece

Although Turkey had observed the verbal agreement of 22 July 1982 with Greece for bilateral detente, Bayulken noted, the Greek Government's behavior had been provocative and disillusioning. He cited among the manifestations of this behavior: "The conditioning of Greek public opinion with hostile feelings against Turkey, [word indistinct] of designs against Turkey's territorial integrity, retelling and distorting of historic events in a manner that approves the past adventures of Greece, renewal of allegations about an imaginary "Turkish threat," and its use as an element of blackmail against other parties, and finally, the attempt to make groundless comments that affect directly Turkey's rights and interests in the Aegean." He hoped the Greek Government would correct the distortions in its view and contribute to reopening the way to a dialogue.

Cyprus

With regard to Cyprus, Bayulken called for avoiding external negative influences on intercommunal talks, so that the progress made so far toward a federal solution was [word indistinct]. Turkey views the attempts to draw the issue outside the intercommunal talks in this light, he commented.

Tug: No Commitments Outside NATO

Earlier in the session, assembly member Aydin Tug said Turkey should not take on any responsibilities beyond NATO boundaries. NATO members held national interests above those of the alliance Tug said, as demonstrated by the recent lifting by the U.S. of sanctions against the Soviet-European gas pipeline.

Hence Turkey too should apply a "multilateral foreign policy," he said. Some circles had become concerned with amelioration of relations between Turkey and the U.S. he said, because they were concerned Turkey might be used as a base for the Rapid Deployment Force against the Middle East.

Further Bayulken Statements

[Text] Ankara, 16 Nov (AA) -- Defence Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken said Turkey's Middle East policy was unchanged, and she would continue to serve as an element of peace and stability in this region.

Answering criticisms of the 1983 defence budget in the Consultative Assembly, Bayulken declared Turkish policy was formulated exclusively by Turkish national authorities.

There should be no concern over modernization of certain airports in Turkey, as this had nothing to do with any Rapid Deployment force. NATO member countries could act independently in their national interests, Bayulken said, adding NATO had taken no decision concerning the Rapid Deployment Force. Turkey would not accept any function beyond NATO boundaries, and no other state could force Turkey to do so, Bayulken said. Training agreements between Turkey and some other countries should not be confused with pacts, he added.

POLITICAL PARTIES LAW PLANNED FOR FEBRUARY

[Text] It has been announced that a new law on the political parties might go into effect in February 1983. In a news conference today, Consultative Assembly Constitutional Committee spokesman Sener Akyol said that the committee was trying to prepare the political parties law as soon as possible.

[Begin Akyol recording] Today, the Constitutional Committee began preparing the political parties law so that it can go into effect in February 1983. The committee is trying to have it ready as soon as possible. I believe that in order to pass on to a democratic system as soon as possible, it would be useful to prepare the political parties law speedily. For this purpose, the committee has set up five subcommittees, giving each one part of the law to be prepared. I would like to point out that while preparing this law, our committee will pay attention, first and foremost, to the measures that will prevent a leadership oligarchy within the parties. However, it is important to be as careful as possible in determining the extent of these measures. In preparing this bill, our committee will also tackle issues such as the political parties' financial resources, the parties' closing down, party bans and so on. Our committee will provide solutions to these problems and stipulations within the framework of our new Constitution.

There is a distinctive movement in our country toward abandoning the primary election system through delegates. We will try to find the solutions sought by our nation. I am sure that our press and the experts on that issue, as well as the Consultative Assembly members, will help the committee on that matter. At this point, there is no question of a preference for any particular electoral system, because one can reach the same results by choosing this or that section of the existing electoral systems [as heard]. Consequently, at this point there is no question of a preference for any particular election system. [end recording]

MILITARY JUDGES ARRESTED FOR TAKING BRIBES

[Text] Ankara, Nov 16 (AFP) -- Two military judges at Golcuk, on the sea of Marmara east of Istanbul, where last Friday arrested for taking bribes to change a death penalty to life imprisonment, informed sources said here today. Judge Major Eyup Mentes, reported to be a nephew of Justice Minister Cevdet Mentes, and Major Caglar Aksoy were arrested at the courthouse as they accepted some 20,000 dollars from relatives of four defendants facing the death penalty, the sources said.

The court had found the four guilty of robbing 13 banks, two jewelers and two producer cooperatives in an "attempt to overthrow the existing constitutional order and establish a Marxist-Leninist regime." The military prosecutor had asked for the death penalty but sentence was delayed until December 3 after the police raid on the courthouse. The two judges have been jailed, the sources said.

TURKISH-YUGOSLAV TRANSPORTATION TALKS BEGIN

In a speech opening the talks, Turkish Transportation Minister Aysan said that Turkey and Yugoslavia have a friendship based on historical ties, adding that they both were a bridge between Europe and the Middle East. Aysan pointed out that the two countries had important opportunities for cooperation in the field of transportation, adding that the recent developments in world transportation necessitated an increase in their cooperation. Aysan expressed the belief that important decisions for the future would be made during the talks in the fields of transportation and communications.

The Yugoslav transportation minister stated that there were good relations between Turkey and his country, adding that the usefulness and fruitfulness of these relations were confirmed once again during the latest visit to Yugoslavia by President Kenan Evren. The visiting minister said that their purpose was to strengthen the ties between the two countries. He expressed the belief that his visit would lead to the further development of the cooperation between the two countries.

The Turkish-Yugoslav talks will end tomorrow and a transportation protocol on the issues the two sides agree upon signed.

Following today's official talks, the visiting minister was received by state minister and Acting Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara. Transportation Minister Aysan was also present at the meeting. Baykara said at the meeting that the good relations which originated from the historical friendship ties between the two countries must be further promoted.

VOTCP DENOUNCES U.S.-FRG STATEMENT ON TURKEY

TA170844 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Station commentary: "Dangerous Developments in Turkish- U.S. Relations"]

[Text] Chancellor Helmut Kohl's Washington visit was concluded with a terrible joint statement. Reference was made in the statement to dangerous plans for Turkey by these two most reactionary and dangerous imperialist countries. In fact, the statement says that the FRG and U.S. Administrations support the Evren dictatorship in Turkey and that the military aid will be increased to this oppressive regime in a bid to strengthen NATO's southeastern wing. Why have Reagan and Kohl, the two fierce defenders of the imperialist crusade, felt obliged to make such a statement regarding Turkey?

It is obvious that the reaction of the Western European public against the dictatorship of the generals in Turkey has increased in the wake of the so-called public referendum in behalf of the new Constitution. As a result, the military junta has been alienated abroad. The reactionary administrations in the FRG and the United States are exerting efforts to save the junta from this situation and to alleviate the reaction.

Moreover, their goal is to involve Turkey more deeply in the crusade undertaken by these two imperialist countries against socialism, the national liberation movements and the Nonaligned Movement and thus to use our country as an outpost in their expansionist and aggressive plans in the Middle East. That is why they support the Evren dictatorship.

In a bid to deserve such unfortunate support, the military junta falls more and more in line with U.S. plans. It provides the United States with new military bases and facilities for the Rapid Deployment Force [RDF]. Ten military airfields are being expanded for use by these troops and additional logistic installations are being built. Both the world and local press organs have carried reports about the secret military agreement signed between the junta and the United States to this effect. The junta administration is exerting efforts in a bid to conceal these dangerous developments, which are becoming more and more apparent to the public.

In an interview with Istanbul daily MILLIYET's correspondent Mehmet Ali Kislali, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen tried through demagogy to conceal the truth behind the stationing of the RDF on our soil. He sweated to explain that the bases are being provided to the RDF within the framework of NATO. However, these efforts are in vain. Only recently, NATO officials declared that this was an issue which concerned Turkey and the United States.

Let us assume that statements to the effect that the airfields being expanded and the military bases being newly established for the RDF are all being undertaken within the NATO framework. How then can the existence of the Turkish-U.S. joint defense group be explained? In a statement it issued on the establishment of this group, the Turkish Communist Party had warned that under the pretext of coordination in the event of a crisis in the region, the group was in fact directed against the Soviet Union as well as all the regional national liberation movements. The statement pointed out that with bilateral agreements signed outside the framework of NATO, the United States was implementing its plans of expanding the NATO sphere of influence through such agreements.

Dear listeners, the latest developments have proved several times over the truth of this observation. The RDF from the United States has participated in military exercises in the Gallipoli and carried out amphibious exercises in the Gulf of Saros. Despite these developments, Turkmen dares to claim that Turkey has no commitments outside of NATO. Through such demagogy, Turkmen is trying is make a good bargain with the United States and to act as if the United States and NATO were two different entities. In fact, the general NATO plans are nothing but the U.S. strategic expansionist plans. The United States is the big boss of NATO, and imposes its expansionist plans on NATO as it wishes. The most obvious sign of this situation is the NATO decision in connection with the deployment of the U.S. nuclear missiles in Western Europe.

Whatever they do, whatever demagogy they use, the generals will never be able to conceal the truth that providing bases for the stationing of the RDF and becoming the tool of U.S. imperialist plans are in complete contradiction with our national interests. These military bases have been established for aggressive purposes against our neighboring socialist countries and the Islamic Arab countries in the Middle East. The Reagan administration will use these bases whenever it wants in a bid to acquire new positions in the Persian Gulf. However, such a move would drag Turkey into a dangerous position. The junta generals concede to this. However, our people will never accept this.

SPAIN

'SYMBOLIC' SUPPORT FOR NATO'S CSCE AMENDMENTS

LD161630 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 16 Nov 82

[Text] The Spanish delegation at the CSCE will now support amendments submitted at the Madrid meeting by the NATO member countries under new instructions received from the government.

Just before this morning's session, head of the Spanish delegation Ambassador Pan de Soraluce said that he has received new instructions from the government relating to Spain's attitude toward proposals submitted by the NATO member countries.

To date, the Spanish delegation has maintained a certain reserve regarding the work of the conference out of courtesy to the new Socialist Government to be formed as a result of the 28 October elections, and for this reason Spain has made no official pronouncements of any specific issues in this phase of the conference. Mr Pan de Soraluce said that he received specific orders from Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca to the effect that the Spanish delegation should support and co-sponsor the three proposals contained in the document RM-41 submitted by the NATO countries.

Ambassador Pan de Soraluce spelled out that these new instructions from the government do not signal a change of attitude on the part of the Spanish delegation while Minister Perez-Llorca is absent heading the official Spanish delegation to Moscow for the funeral of Soviet leader Brezhnev. The proposals in question, Pan de Soraluce added, are to do with human rights and are important. The new instructions, he added, are to cosponsor the proposals, and I should say, he pointed out, that in my opinion co-sponsoring these proposals is merely symbolic.

[Text] Lucerne, Nov 16 (AFP) -- Bulgarian international grandmaster Tatiana Lemachko, who asked for political asylum here yesterday, spent her first night of freedom in the police station here, it was learned today. Lemachko, born in the Soviet Union but now living in Bulgaria following her marriage to a Bulgarian citizen nine years ago, had been playing for the Bulgarian team in the chess-olympics here. It was understood that she stayed at the police station rather than going to a hotel for security reasons.

No official comment has yet been made by the Bulgarian team on the defection of the country's top woman player.

It was not known here this afternoon if Lemachko, who has a six-year old daughter still in Sofia, was still in Lucerne or had travelled on to Berne.

KREISKY WILL MEET ANDROPOV BY MID-1983

AU171440 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 17 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- At the beginning of next year, Kreisky will not only visit with U.S. President Reagan but will also meet with Brezhenv's successor in the Kremlin, Andropov.

The date for the visit to the Soviet Union has not yet been fixed. It is, however, certain that Kreisky will visit Moscow in the first half of the year. Before Brezhnev's death and shortly after the official announcement of the invitation to the White House, the Soviet ambassador in Vienna handed Kreisky an invitation from the Soviet Government to come to Moscow. In view of the funeral ceremonies for Brezhnev, the chancellory only now made public the Soviet invitation to Kreisky.

MINISTER SCHNEIDER RETURNS FROM GDR VISIT

[Text] Wernigerode, 16 Nov (DPA) -- FRG Minister for Regional Planning, Housing and Urban Development Dr Oscar Schneider concluded his visit to the the GDR on Tuesday after a program of sight-seeing in Wernigerode in the Harz, and returned to the FRG by the Marienborn/Helmstedt border crossing point. At the end of his 2-day visit to the GDR, Schneider said in Wernigerode that this first official GDR trip by a member of the Christian-liberal coalition has clearly shown that the new Federal Government wishes to continue the intra-German dialogue, which is in the interests of the people of both states.

Schneider, who travelled to the GDR to open a Federal German architectural exhibition in Magdeburg, said that in his field there were many points of contact. He could envisage an exchange of experiences on the renewal and modernization of cities. Nevertheless, he gained the impression that city-planning in the GDR is being pursued in a forum which has been surpassed in the FRG. But it must be recognized that creditable results have been achieved in the GDR under most difficult circumstances, as for example in the renewal of Wernigerode. During his visit, Schneider also visited a recently built housing area in Magdeburg. On Tuesday, he visited the gothic cathedral there before continuing to Werigerode.

JOBERT COMMENTS ON LIFTING OF SANCTIONS

PM171147 Paris LE MATIN in French 15 Nov 82 p 3

[Interview with French Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert by Henry Lauret -- date and place not given, first paragraph is editorial introduction]

[Text] How should we analyze a decision which concerns both the diplomatic and commercial links which our country has with the two superpowers? Michel Jobert, formerly foreign minister under Georges Pompidou and today Francois Mitterrand's foreign trade minister, gives his viewpoint on Ronald Reagan's decision to lift the embargo on the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline.

Michel Jobert: We take note of President Reagan's decision and we are pleased that common sense has prevailed. The embargo was the result of a decision taken unilaterally by the U.S. Government without consulting its allies. It was a decision which seemed to be directed at the Soviet Union and which in the end mainly constrained the U.S. allies. At the same time -- is there any need to recall it -- the Americans became very large grain suppliers to the Soviet Union. That was the background to the issue. The French Government thought that the United States would sooner or later have to admit that one unilateral decision should be replaced by another unilateral decision -- that of lifting that embargo, which was, ultimately, a sanction against the U.S. European allies.

LE MATIN: It is an expected decision comes in the nick of time. That is obviously no coincidence?

Michel Jobert: I think that this decision comes at the appropriate time in U.S. concerns. At a time when, on the occasion of Leonid Brezhnev's death, the United States is sending an increasing number of signs or signals to the USSR aimed at an improvement in their relations, and now that Lech Walesa has been released, the United States cannot maintain a decision which embarrasses it and which also seems like a rather offensive attitude toward the USSR.

LE MATIN: Negotiations had been going on in Washington for some time. What was their object?

Michel Jobert: They were talks, not negotiations. Indeed, there had been talks in Washington for around 3 weeks between the Europeans and Americans at the ambassadorial level. The United States had wanted to link the lifting of the embargo with talks or conditions, roughly speaking, on the way in which East-West trade might be better coordinated on the Western side. We refused to link the two matters. I repeat that the embargo was the result of an initiative by the Americans. The latter could, therefore, only overcome it by another initiative.

LE MATIN: In any case, President Reagan seems to think that now that he has lifted the embargo, the United States and its allies can agree on the rest?

Michel Jobert: The difference of opinion relates to the fact that President Reagan thinks that things are settled: He has lifted the embargo, he has the Europeans' agreement. That is not exactly our viewpoint. The Washington talks have not been completed. You cannot give agreement on something which is not finished.

LE MATIN: France reacted immediately. Paris denied the reports and made it known. Its European partners are more discreet. What political significance does that have?

Michel Jobert: The significance is obvious; it is that in principle, consultation is an essential thing. The embargo decision was not the result of the spirit of consultation. Since the talks between us are not over, we point out that the spirit of consultation is even more necessary.

LE MATIN: Are there not, fundamentally, deep disagreements between Paris and Washington, if only on the way of administering East-West relations?

Michel Jobert: The most important thing is the attitude. We are urging the United States to regard us as partners, to see that we are not part of a system controlled by its initiative, in a direction which suits it and in keeping with its domestic or foreign policy concerns. That is the essential point.

As regards the role which France intends to play in East-West relations, there is great continuity in French policy. Everybody knows that and can see it, and this continuity corresponds to France's fundamental interest which is dictated by its very geographical position. Consequently, our prime concern in East-West relations is not the smooth administration of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States, it is detente practised by all the others, I would say to the exclusion of the two superpowers. It is a system which offers each a margin of freedom which the very organization of relations between the superpowers does not immediately give them. That is the detente policy. It is that policy which France has been pursuing for many years with great obstinacy and with a very general vision because all countries can identify with it.

MONTE CARLO RADIO REPORTS KING HUSAYN STATEMENTS

JN172200 Monte Carlo Radio Monte Carlo in Arabic 2030 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Excerpts] King Husayn of Jordan, who is heading the Arab delegation which stems from the Fes conference, concluded his talks with French President Francois Mitterrand and then held a press conference in which he discussed the outcome of his talks and the scope of peace in the Middle East.

Recalling what Yasir 'Arafat has told us, we asked King Husayn: Do the Arabs, who have based their plan on UN Resolution 242, think that the PLO, which is a full partner to the Arab plan, has agreed on UN Resolution 242?

The king answered: [Begin recording] No one recognizes the present status quo as it is. We have presented the bases on which peace can be established in the region. A short while ago I described these bases as the minimum and the maximum of what we can present so that a just and honorable peace may be established in the region. I cannot speak for my brothers in the Arab world in this regard. However, the foundations are clear and frank and they are based on UN and Security Council resolutions, as I mentioned. Naturally, when we talk about the past we can say that we weren't able to make progress in implementing some UN Security Council resolutions. Yet this is the first time the Arabs have reached an agreement and taken a unified stand at the leadership level. [end recording]

We asked King Husayn if the situation is ripe for the recognition of Israel. The king said: [Begin recording] The Fes summit resolutions are the outcome of an Arab effort and action through a long stage of our life, particularly through the year which preceded the Fes meeting. It is the intention of the Fes meeting to crystallize a clear Arab stand setting the bounds which I describe as the minimum and the maximum. This is the boundary beyond which we cannot go in either direction.

President Reagan's plan was proposed during that time. The eight-point plan, I believe, was not formulated or meant to be a reply to President Reagan's plan. The Reagan plan is a new development. The Fes summit saw that we could have a dialogue with the American side, stemming from the feeling that the Reagan plan contained some positive points as well as some ambiguous points. The dialogue continues, however. [end recording]

On Syrian-Jordan relations, King Husayn said that they have been normal since the Fes summit conference and that he met at length yesterday with 'Abd al-Halim Khaddam.

Finally, we asked the king about Lebanon -- the withdrawal from Lebanon and the possibility of a meeting with Lebanese President Amin al-Jumayyil in the near future. The king said: [Begin recording] I am expecting his excellency, President Amin al-Jumayyil to visit Jordan in the near future. Naturally, we will discuss with him all the issues and the affairs of the hour. We are hoping and working for a withdrawal from Lebanon so that Lebanon can restore accord and spread its sovereignty over all its territories. [end recording]

More on Press Statements

[Text] Paris -- His Majesty King Husayn has said that the seven-member Arab committee he is heading is visiting France for the purpose of explaining the Arab peace plan approved by the Fes summit to French officials headed by President Francois Mitterrand and to the French public. This, he added, is part of the mission of this committee, which was entrusted by the Arab summit to contact the permanent member states of the UN Security Council.

Speaking at a press conference in Paris yesterday, his majesty said that the Arab peace plan expressed Arab unanimity on the achievement of peace through the implementation of the plan's eight points, which are based on international legality and the UN General Assembly and Security Council resolutions: in particular, Resolution 242, which bears out two main bases: the impermissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and, therefore, the withdrawal from the Arab territories which were occupied in 1967, and the acknowledgement of the right of self-determination for peoples as well as the right of all the peoples of the region to live in security and peace.

King Husayn asserted that the Fes summit resolutions are a major step toward peace, which we believe in and seek to achieve. These resolutions are adequate to achieve a just and balanced peace and thus put an end to the bitter conflict which has continued for decades between the Palestinian people and the Arabs on the one hand; and Israel and the aggression, occupation and expansion it represents against the Palestinian people and the Arabs on the other.

The king explained: The just, comprehensive and peaceful solution we are advocating on the basis of the Arab peace plan guarantees security and peace for all the states in the region.

It also guarantees the Palestinian people's right to determine their own destiny in their homeland, including Arab Jerusalem.

His Majesty King Husayn said: The whole world is aware of the consequences of the Israeli occupation of the whole of Palestine and some of the territories of the Arab states surrounding Israel. It is also aware of the continuous tragedy caused by Israel's invasion of Lebanon and occupation of the capital, Beirut, and large tracts of that Arab country, which has been, and will again be, the model of democracy and free coexistence and interaction among different communities.

The king added: What Israel committed in Lebanon and Beirut, especially the Sabra and Shatila massacres, against the Lebanese and Palestinian people will remain an eternal tragedy in the history of mankind.

The king said that it is Israel which is threatening peace and security in our region. As a matter of fact, it is fighting peace and there is no limit to its ambitions. The king said we do not know which Israeli borders we are asked to recognize and coexist with. The next step, he stressed, must come from Israel and the international community.

Asked if the Fes summit resolutions conflict with U.S. President Reagan's peace plan for the Middle East, King Husayn said: The Fes resolutions are the outcome of long, hard work by the Arabs, especially in the year preceding the Fes summit, to evolve a clear Arab stand, from which we cannot retreat or consider the possibility of retreat under any circumstances. His majesty explained that the eight points of the plan were not formulated as a reaction to the U.S. President's plan. The Arab plan represents a new development. The summit conference also considered the need to begin a dialogue with the U.S. side out of the general feeling that there are positive elements, but also some vague points, in the U.S. plan. Therefore, the dialogue is continuing to examine this new reality and develop the other sides' stands so that they will conform to the Arab stand and achieve just and honorable peace.

His majesty said that the plan proposed by President Reagan represents a new major and positive development by the United States, which is the central party in this world through which we are trying to defend our clear rights and cause. The king stressed that the main reasons for not making progress on the path of a just and honorable peace are the influence of U.S. policy and the U.S. position on our issue.

Concerning future Jordanian-Palestinian relations, His Majesty King Husayn said: This subject concerns us and our Palestinian brothers. It is not a new subject. In fact, it concerns the members of one family who lived together in times of challenges and dangers. As Jordanians and Palestinians we cling to our identity and there is much which distinguishes us as brothers facing one destiny and who seek the same goals. His Majesty King Husayn added: The subject of Jordanian-Palestinian relations is not new. I discussed it with my brothers in the PLO under the chairmanship of Brother Yasir 'Arafat a few years ago. We were in the process of holding serious talks to crystallize a certain concept about future relations so that when the suitable circumstances present themselves, the Jordanians and Palestinians can express their opinion about this concept -- a concept which directly concerns us as Jordanians and Palestinians. No foreign side has the right to interfere in this affair.

On the possibility of Egypt's return to the Arab fold, his majesty said: One of my dearest wishes -- and I think our wishes in the Arab world -- is to see Egypt take its normal place as soon as possible. We have lived through emergency circumstances which I hope will not last long.

Meanwhile, and regarding the main issues, in many fields I see no difference in stands and insistence on the establishment of a comprehensive peace based on the return of Arab rights to their owners, particularly those rights related to the Palestinian Arab people and their complete and legitimate rights on the soil of their homeland.

On the Iraqi-Iranian war, His Majesty King Husayn said: Our attitude toward the Iraqi-Iranian war was dealt with in the Fes summit. We hope that this war will end as soon as possible and that future relations will be based on mutual respect and non-interference in internal affairs. We hope that not only will Iraqi-Iranian relations be based on these principles, but also Iran's relations with all our brothers in the region. We support Iraq in this battle out of our feeling that we are Arab League members. We also have the Arab League Charter, the collective Arab Defense Pact and Arab rights. We believe that Iraq was provoked and attacked. We are not in favor of war; we want the best of relations between the brothers, neighbors and friends. We hope that this will be the situation. However, we are against aggression on Arab lands. Any danger threatening any part of the Arab homeland is a danger threatening the entire Arab nation.

CHEYSSON ON DEVELOPMENT OF EAST-WEST RELATIONS

[Text] During the debate on the Foreign Ministry budget, Claude Cheysson [external relations minister] emphasized the development of East-West relations, and that there are many conflicting issues which should not preclude further dialogue:

[Begin Cheysson recording] We are greatly disappointed to see that there is no progress in Afghanistan, which continues to be occupied by Soviet troops, and in Poland where on 13 December last year the regime abolished freedoms in which we have all had confidence since August 1980. Of course, the appeasement that normalization can have a human face and that we are still within the framework of what is called normalization.

We must condemn and continue to condemn the exaggerated, excessive arming [surarmement] which continues in East Europe; excessive armament which threatens us directly. However, this does not prevent us from trying to maintain technical, scientific and economic relations with the Soviet Union, which we shall continue to maintain and develop in so far as they serve mutual interests, or in any case our interests, on the condition of course that this does not strengthen the defense potential of the leader of the alliance which is opposed to our alliance. [end recording]

Time Ripe for Stronger Ties

[Daniel Vernet dispatch: "Mr Andropov and Mr Gromyko Meet With Many Western and Asian Leaders"]

[Excerpts] Moscow -- [French Premier] Mauroy's talks with [Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers] Tikhonov and [French External Relations Minister] Cheysson's talks with [Soviet Foreign Minister] Gromyko were much shorter and seem to have been scarcely more than exchanges required by protocol. Nonetheless, the French premier first had had a longer meeting at the French Embassy with CPSU Central Committee International Department First Deputy Chief Vadim Zagladin. Thus, it was possible for Franco-Soviet relations to be discussed in more detail.

France Does Not Intend To "Miss the Boat"

The political obstacles to the resumption of high-level dialogue remain: They are called Afghanistan and Poland. The economic obstacles do not seem to be about to disappear. The growing trade deficit to France's detriment particularly irritates Paris because at the same time, business has continued between the USSR and the FRG, Italy and even Britain.

Mr Cheysson Detects "Political Elements in That Trade Imbalance."

Indeed, it is possible that the Soviets are trying to "punish" the French for the 18 months of cold-shouldering which followed Mr Mitterrand's election. In addition, they regard France as the weakest link in the Western community and by demanding credit at ridiculously low interest rates, are trying to exert pressure on it to break to OECD "consensus" which fixes 12.5 percent as the minimum rate for guaranteed credit granted to the USSR. The financial agreement between France and the USSR, which expired at the beginning of this year, has still not been renewed.

The French external relations minister has repeatedly said that political relations between Paris and Moscow cannot be completely normal while the occupation of Afghanistan continues. But the French leaders seem anxious not to miss the boat and not to be the last to return to a more favorable attitude toward Moscow if the Germans and Americans are interested in contacts with the new leadership. The "sobering up period" in Franco-Soviet relations, rendered necessary, according to government circles, by Mr Giscard d'Estaing's naivete and illusions, is drawing to an end. Brezhnev's death might hasten improved relations on the understanding that fundamental disagreements have not been forgotten. Dialogue has never been broken as Mr Cheysson has met with Mr Gromyko three times in 1 year at the United Nations and it may now be time to strengthen ties.

[Editorial: "Andropov's Diplomacy"]

[Text] Even it if is too soon to make an overall judgment of Mr Andropov, it must be admitted that the new CPSU general secretary is a determined man. He has demonstrated that in just 4 days; even if he bows to the imperatives of collegial leadership, this man is not the type to make do with being merely a figurehead.

Look at the facts: Although Soviet protocol certainly did not require it, he had no hesitation in coming to the forefront throughout Monday and in having meetings with the most important Western and Asian leaders who had come to attend Leonid Brezhnev's funeral. He had meetings, some of them attended by [Soviet Foreign Minister] Gromyko, with West German President Carstens, U.S. Vice President Bush and Secretary of State Schultz, and also with Mrs Gandhi, Afghan President Karmal and Pakistani President Ziaul Haq.

Those last three meetings deserve particular attention because it was of course the situation in Afghanistan which was the focal point of the discussions. The war in Afghanistan is not only a serious and costly problem for Moscow, but it can also be solved or, at least eased, providing the political will to do so exists.

Of course, it would be imprudent to conclude from Monday's talks that the Soviet position on Afghanistan is going to change. But it can no longer be ruled out, especially since Mr Andropov is thought to have been opposed to the invasion of that country.

That question deserves to be followed very closely since its solution will have a great influence on a possible normalization of Sino-Soviet relations. In addition to the settlement of its border conflict with Moscow and of the Kampuchean problem, Beijing is in fact asking the Kremlin for a goodwill gesture in Afghanistan to further the rapprochement started during the final weeks of the Brezhnev reign.

Of course, it is possible to think that Mr Andropov is considering playing the China card to force Washington to adopt a more favorable attitude. Nonetheless, what has just happened in Moscow cannot be reduced to mere "signals." Similarly, one cannot fail to stress the "tough" attitude adopted by Mr Andropov toward Washington in his first two public speeches. The U.S. military "challenge" he said in substance, will be met whatever happens. And, as if to give the message more weight, the general secretary ommitted to pronounce the conventional statements on the goodwill which the USSR would be presumed to show in the negotiations on strategic weapons and on the Euromissiles. It is up to the Americans to mediate on the lesson....

By comparison, France's place in that diplomatic ballet seems very modest. Mr Mauroy was only received by Mr Tiknonov, his counterpart. But, judging from the state of mind prevailing in Paris, it seems that a change might occur in its case too, since the Western governments are so ready to compete with each other, each hoping to be the first to be heeded by the new Soviet leaders. Provided you do not cherish any illusions about Mr Andropov's underlying intentions, you cannot help admiring the "professionaiism" he is demonstrating.

LE MONDE VIEWS DEBATE OVER STRATEGIC POSTURE

[Jacques Isnard commentary: "The French Armed Forces in the East-West Balance of Forces"]

[Text] The recent Falklands conflict between Argentina and Britain demonstrated that it is possible for a nonnuclear state not to be held in check by the threat of reprisals by a nuclear state, a threat which proves not to be credible outside the mere safeguarding of its strict vital interests. The absence of such a fear can lead the "weaker" country to challenge the nuclear state and even decide to take the initiative in opening fire against it.

That case of open conflict below what is called the threshold of a nuclear response between a recognized nuclear power and a country which is not such a power is a precedent: It directly shows the need to maintain enough large conventional forces in conjunction with a nuclear arsenal, since that ultimate panoply does not counter all possible crises and does not safeguard its possessor from the dangers of a local conventional conflict.

In the specific case of the Falklands, it could even be said that if the Argentines had waited 1 year before trying to settle their territorial dispute with the British by force, they would have had even more military advantages, particularly because of Britain's probable inability to gather an imposing naval force after selling its heavy intervention means to foreign countries or placing them on reserve.

This Falklands lesson is particularly pertinent since, juding from the 1983 defense budget submitted for the deputies' approval on 12 and 13 November, France, for fairly similar and constraining financial reasons, is also faced with the need to choose between its future arms programs, which cannot all be pursued with the same urgency.

Since nuclear priority is being maintained, it must decide to reshape its conventional forces. At the same time, the Defense Ministry has just sent its commanding officers a 36-page internal document on the armed forces in the world, illustrated with tables and photographs.

Officially, this document is intended for its readers' consideration -- "A mere reference point aimed at objectivity," it states --"for those who want to undertake the comprehensive study of contemporary defense problems."

Such a presentation does not make it impossible to point out, for instance, that "the Soviet Union, with its 300 operational SS20 missiles, each carrying three nuclear warheads, may try to neutralize all its neighbors by destroying their military means," or that, in addition to their traditional support missions for the armed forces engaged on the battlefield, "the Soviet airborne forces, under the defense minister's direct authority, are capable of autonomous operations which could consist of seizing major objectives (government centers, busy ports) or carrying out actions of sheer force outside the main theater of operations."

Indeed, the debate opened is a fundamental debate for France, which is due to announce a 1984-1988 military program next year, fixing the manpower levels, quantities of equipment and installations necessary for its defense, but also for its Atlantic allies. Indeed, the NATO European member countries have been asked by Gen Bernard Rogers, supreme commander allied forces in Europe, to think about the consequences of the fact that the Soviet Union has now succeeded in equalling -- or perhaps outstripping -- the West in the nuclear arms sphere while remaining superior to the West as regards conventional weapons.

"What concerns me," he recently confided to some French deputies, "is that, in the context of an international crisis, the Soviets might think that they have both the capability of inflicting a conventional defeat on us and an adequate nuclear advantage to deter NATO from resorting to nuclear weapons."

According to General Rogers' thinking, this means in practical terms that the Western countries -- which do not have adequate conventional weapons to intimidate their adversary -- have the choice between two alternatives: either they are first to use nuclear weapons if they have them, or they capitulate. Those two decisions are, at all events, daunting. "With conventional means capable of deterring," the supreme commander of the NATO forces commented, "we would force the potential aggressor, who is no more anxious than us to resort to it, to take the initiative of nuclear escalation himself."

Who can now claim that France will escape that choice? Of course, General Rogers' ideas are connected with what is termed the organization of "forward defense." In other words the capability to contain a large-scale conventional attack at the most forward possible point in the allied defense network in Europe, in order to force the adversary to retreat or to raise the level of his aggression.

It is known that France rejects that forward strategy because it is automatic. But the head of state, whoever he might be, probably needs -- if he is to try more effectively to control a deteriorating international crisis -- to be certain that he constantly has enough strong and mobile conventional forces before threatening to brandish the supreme response without justification. With too light a conventional network, he too would have no choice but to prematurely open nuclear fire or give way.

In the vast trial of strength of deterrence, it is necessary to be able to brace yourself to resist the pressure exerted by the adversary, to have resources [des "biscuits"], as the military like to say. The French Defense Ministry document shows that the balance of forces in the world is worrying enough in itself to justify a new consideration of the French Armed Forces' future.

This is precisely the debate which is commencing in France on the place, organization and size of the air and ground battle corps and on the nature and number of the tactical nuclear weapons around which it must be coordinated. This debate will find its natural expression in next year's discussion on the military programming law in Parliament, and Mr Pierre Mauroy invoked it at the Institute of Higher National Defense Studies when he mentioned the prospect of a "new model for the army."

NATO: 'New Strategic Concept'

PM171101 Paris LE FIGARO in French 13-14 Nov 82 p 6

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "A New Strategic Concept"]

[Text] Western Europe's defense -- at least in the NATO framework and according to its strategic concepts -- is again going to be the subject fo a great debate during the coming weeks and months. The fact is that U.S. General Bernard Rogers, commander-in-chief of the forces which come under the Atlantic military organization, is going to present to the member countries' defense ministers what is modestly being called a "new strategic concept" and is going to ask for its adoption. But this time such important changes are involved that this will not happen without major upheavals within NATO, even if it is believed that ultimately, as usual, the U.S. views will prevail.

First, let us summarize the facts of the problem. It was on 27 September in London that General Rogers first presented his new "concept" to a few experts. Then he officially explained it in detail with all the consequences on 14 October to the NATO military committee in Brussels, which comprises the member states' chiefs of staff (let us recall at the outset that France is not part of that and the affair does not directly concern it). General Rogers is to subsequently defend his new plans on 29 and 30 November during the regular "Eurogroup" and nuclear planning group meetings and then -- and this will naturally be the decisive stage -- to the defense planning committee and the NATO countries' defense ministers on 1 and 2 December.

The Coventional Forces

Essentially, the new "concept" makes provision for the preparation, organization and implementation, in the event of conflict, of a decisive counteroffensive waged exclusively with conventional forces against the second echelon of the Warsaw Pact forces. It is admitted -- presuming, as always, that the initiative is taken by the adversary -- that the first echelon of those forces would encounter the first lines of the NATO armies, which would have to suffer its attacks, resist them and curb them at the cost of inevitable losses and setbacks. But the deployment of the bulk of the NATO forces, their coordination, their equipment and, above all, the doctrine governing their use, ought henceforth to be such that they are capable of launching a large-scale counteroffensive as early as possible with the aim of destroying the second echelon of adversary forces and capable of achieving advances leading into Soviet territory.

This concept is justified, according to General Rogers, by the great progress made in the conventional armaments sphere: Mobility and lightness of delivery vehicles, exceptional accuracy of fire, and the unparalleled performance of U.S. weapons in "electronic warfare" capability. In this connection, some of the lessons of the Lebanese war are invoked and even some lessons from the October 1973 Near East war: For instance, the ability of the Israeli aircraft, whose equipment was supplied by the United States, to render Syrian aircraft "blind", or the methods used by the Israeli Air Force to destroy the Soviet-made Syrian surface-to-air missile batteries on the ground before they could be used, or even the Israeli tanks' superior electronic equipment against even the famous Russian T-72, whose "firing preparations apparatus" proved disappointing compared to the U.S. performance. Similarly, General Rogers invokes the possible use of conventional explosives by cruise missiles: their extraordinary precision would make it possible to do without nuclear explosives even for destroying highly "strengthened" objectives. The NATO commander-in-chief clearly believes that the development of the armaments from the first precise guided munitions -- called "precison weapons" in French -- to the present achievements renders plausible a new type of conventional war in which the technological advances made by the U.S. arms industries ought to give the West the advantage.

Tactical Nuclear Weapons

The corollary to this is the abandonment of any first use of tactical nuclear weapons. The argument in favor of General Rogers' theses can be summarized as follows: The use of nuclear weapons must not turn the West European territories into nuclear battlefields and that would be the case if, as is presently planned, they are used when the balance of conventional weapons becomes decidedly unfavorable; the adversary must be given the responsibility of opening "nuclear fire" in the knowledge that he would immediately be opposed by a response of the same nature; it is in any case not in the tactical nuclear weapons sphere that it is possible to have decisive superiority, given that the number of such weapons possessed by the adversary, even if inferior to the number of tactical weapons which NATO possesses (4,500 as against around 7,000), is enough to create a balance. Whatever the value of those arguments, the fact is that General Rogers has mentioned a possible withdrawal of 6,000 nuclear warheads from the European theater.

The new 'strategic concept" being proposed to NATO is obviously derived from research carried out in the United States on modern forms of confrontation between conventional armies. The result of that is found in a work for internal use by the U.S. Army entitled Field Manual 100-5. The latter reports a new doctrine for the use of air and ground forces -- under the name of air land battle 1982-1986 -- which stresses the potential of precision weapons, the lead taken by the United States in the "electronic warfare" sphere, the importance of assault helicopters and the integration, to an unprecedented degree, of land and air operations and so forth. General Rogers subsequently denied being exclusively inspired by the U.S. Army doctrines. He even stressed the differences between the concepts he is advocating and other hypotheses for operations invoked in the United States. But it must be admitted that there is complete harmony between the teachings of Field Manual 100-5 and the new "strategic concept" proposed to NATO.

European Reactions

As was predictable, the latter has sparked off strong reactions from military chiefs in the Atlantic organization's European member countries. That is because it is the exact opposite of what they have always wanted and advocated. Their goal constantly has been the earliest possible use of tactical nuclear weapons to ensure that they are preferably used on the adversary's territory before Western Europe is turned into a battlefield. In the past 20 years this has been reflected in a long series of approaches and proposals -- some more rational than others -- ranging from the idea of a nuclear minefield along the FRG's eastern borders to the plan for multinational nuclear forces, and including the Norsdalt plan and the Strauss plan which aimed to give NATO its own nuclear force. Of course, those suggestions have never been followed up, mainly because the United States intends to keep control over tactical nuclear arms, as over the others, and because the decision to use them rests with the U.S. President alone, so that Washington has never finally committed itself to the timing or conditions for using those weapons.

The reactions were such that General Rogers replied to them with a note on 18 October which relates, in particular, to the question of U.S. nuclear warheads in Europe: There will still be more than 1,000 on the continent; some of the U.S. counterforce nuclear means would be transferred "to the sea" or turned into air-to-surface means; thus a tactical nuclear response, should it be necessary, would not be ruled out.

Of course, the debate will continue and there will undoubtedly be reason to return to it. In conclusion, it should merely be noted that the NATO plans seem to disregard the tactical and strategic consequences of the deployment of highly accurate, medium-range missiles, like the Soviet SS-20's — which, however, have been held up as the symbol of the USSR's vast military strength in recent years. Above all, it will be noted that the U.S. strategic concepts, however well-founded they might be from the U.S. viewpoint, lead to forms of conflict which the European governments do not choose and whose course and outcome are likely to be outside their own decisions and their own analyses, which is further justification, if any such were needed, for France's decision to leave the Atlantic military organization.

COT 10 NOVEMBER RADIO INTERVIEW ON OAU

AB171340 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1100 GMT 17 Nov 82

["Excerpts" from the interview of Jean-Pierre Cot, French minister delegate to the Ministry of External Relations for Cooperation, with Radio France Internationale in Paris on 10 November]

[Excerpts] [Question] What do you think about the forthcoming OAU meeting? What is France's position concerning this organization?

[Answer] As far as France is concerned, the OAU is an important thing. Not that France is directly interested in it; we are not members of the OAU. It is because we are very much attached to the possibility of the African continent following the path of nonalignment settling its affairs without any foreign pressure and interference, especially from the big powers. It is necessary to have an instrument for that: It is the OAU. If it had not existed, it would mean that the Africans would not settle their own affairs; other people would settle their problems for them.

This is why we have supported the OAU from the beginning both in its institutions as well as in its efforts to settle various problems affecting the African continent. We are now happy to note that after a difficult crisis, African wisdom seems to be prevailing and the Tripoli meeting will take place. This meeting will enable the OAU to regain strength and to resume its role which is not confined to the traditional political problems, but is now developing to embrace the fields of economic cooperation, scientific research and cultural cooperation. The OAU is a precious instrument for Africa and I am happy to see that it is preserved.

[Answer] This summit was completely informal. The heads of state did not use an agenda or a plenary session. The single session lasted less than 2 hours and it was quickly observed that it was desirable that the heads of state should be able to meet one another privately. In other words, the Kinshasa summit was what I think a real summit should be: a direct and informal meeting between heads of state, that is, between supreme authorities.

Such a summit is not meant to solve problems. On the other hand, the intimate character of such a meeting makes it possible to discuss everything. It is impossible to draw up a balance sheet. One can only say that for 48 hours, 36 delegations, including 22 heads of state, had an opportunity to work together. And if in the next few months one sees some burning issues of the Kinshasa summit develop in the right direction, one would not say that it is thanks to Kinshasa, but one could think nevertheless that the Kinshasa summit was not useless.

[Question] How do you justify the continued existence of the conference of the heads of state of France and Africa?

[Answer] I do not justify it. I take note of it and I am happy about it.

[Question] Vice President Bush recently reaffirmed that there would be no question of solving the Namibian problem as long as there are Cuban troops in Angola. Does this mean that there is still a complete impasse within the Western contact group on Namibia since we know that France does not share this view? Is Namibia's independence still to be delayed?

[Answer] As far as I know, there is not disagreement within the contact group. This group, which comprises five states including the United States, has reached agreement on the main points which will enable the application of the UN Resolution 435 aimed at ensuring Namibia's accession to independence and sovereignty as early as possible, that is in 1983. The contact group has finished its work. As far as France is concerned, it is finished. By this I mean that there is no need to add external conditions to the application of Resolution 435 which does notmake any reference to the presence of Cuban troops, or of troops of any other nationality, in countries other than Namibia. Angola is a sovereign country which is free to make decisions and which exercises sovereignty over a territory.

We believe that its decisions are sovereign and have nothing to do with the solution of the Namibian problem.

[Question] New institutions have been set up in Cameroon. How will this affect cooperation between France and Cameroon?

[Answer] New institutions have not been established. They are Cameroonian institutions which continue to function with remarkable continuity. President Ahidjo, who dominated the political life of this country for over 20 years and who turned it into a nation with patience, perseverance and a considerable will, to which I pay tribute, is retiring today for his own reasons. He has succeeded in handing over power in an impeccable manner, because in 48 hours Prime Minister Paul Biya was inaugurated as the president of the republic in conformity with the Constitution, and a new prime minister, Bello Bouba, was appointed. A new government was formed which maintained the balance which characterized the former government and the same assembly continues to be seated. There is another obvious continuity which shows the maturity of the Cameroonian political system; I refer to the wisdom and foresight of President Ahidjo himself.

Personally, I am sorry that President Ahidjo has retired for he was a very likeable man. He is a great friend of France. I myself felt great esteem and friendship for that great head of state.

[Question] Did you not go rather hurriedly to Chad in order to make up with Hissein Habre and also to avoid being outdistanced by the Americans?

[Answer] I did not know there was competition in giving development aid. I would like the Americans to do more in this field and I am happy to learn that they have such an interest in the economic development of Chad.

Of course, that is not the reason for my trip. I went to Chad because 5 months after Mr Habre took over and the Chadian institutions were in place, it was time that France made an on-the-spot assessment. It is true that we did not have the opportunity to go there earlier. President Goukouni had been received in Paris by Francois Mitterrand. My friend Guy Penne had been to Ndjamena. Furthermore, events which lasted a number of months made it impossible to pursue normal relations between France and Chad. But France has applied and still applies a constant policy which is to accept things as they are and not as one would like them to be.

We take note of the present situation. There is a government which controls the majority of the territory and which is endeavoring to rebuild the country; we intend to help it. Our aid is not limited to the Fr 20 million, or 1 billion CFA, referred to as a supplement to the aid given last year, which is only to be used during the last months of this year partly for certain projects and partly as working capital.

Since July, this aid has amounted to Fr 13 million, 3.6 billion CFA. This is a large sum but it is not enough in view of the magnitude of the reconstruction task. I should like to say how much I was struck, not as a minister but as a man, by the state of destruction of Ndhamena and even more by the surrounding Chadian countryside. It is a country where everything must be rebuilt. The administration no longer has records, and lacks the basic public services: mainly health services, and the basic factors of production: mainly food production. Everything has to be done. Chad has to settle down to this. The international community as a whole hopes to provide aid and a meeting will be held under the auspices of the United Nations in Geneva at the end of this month. France will attend because it feels that the Chadian people must be helped to regain, not prosperity, but the means of survival and peace.

[Question] Did President Hissein Habre strike you as someone anxious to firmly establish his power or someone motivated by the desire to unite the population and associate all sectors of the population with the management of the state?

[Answer] Of course, as someone who wishes to unite the people. I say "of course" because he could obviously not say anything else. The composition of his government which seems to take into account the Chadian reality appears to have been along these lines. From what I was able to see on the spot, I feel that in Chad, there is a great desire for peace and reconstruction and that President Hissein Habre seems to enjoy a certain amount of trust from this point of view. I believe that it would be unreasonable to put forward any assumptions about the future. The task awaiting President Hissein Habre is considerable. The Chadian authorities have done enormous reconstruction work. They are tackling it with some courage. That is all I have to say.

[Question] How do you feel about recent events in Upper Volta?

[Answer] Upper Volta has an old tradition of democracy which remains active despite the advent of successive military governments. However, we should not exaggerate. For some years now, Upper Voltan democracy has been a democracy with a "military face" with soldiers overthrowing each other.

We do not know much amout the new team or even its composition, so I would not like to make any particular comment on that. My only hope is that the new authorities establish conditions favoring the respect of human rights. On this issue, I would like to say that I am worried about Lieutenant Colonel Nezien, the former minister of interior, who seems to have been killed while willingly presenting himself to the Upper Voltan authorities after having sought refuge in the French Embassy. At any rate, in the case, it is natural to be worried about the outcome of events. I hope this is not an indication that deplorable things will follow.

[Question] Are you sure that France has removed the fear of its African partners who might get angry at seeing France extend its aid and involvement to other Third World countries?

[Answer] We told our African friends, and we are repeating it: They are our privileged partners. This was the subject of a solemn decision made at a closed council meeting held under the chairmanship of Francois Mitterrand on 8 June 1982. This entails a number of [words indistinct] four little Caribbean islands. More generally, we hope to maintain these priorities.

[Question] How are the first fruits of the negotiations of Lome III?

[Answer] Bad. It is true that during the period of a prolonged economic crisis, it is difficult to maintain, preserve and develop this achievement of the general Lome convention as we see the principal forces of the north retreat regarding the development aid effort. The previous figures released by the committees for development aid of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development are very significant: A 1/3 reduction of World Bank programs in sub-Saharan Africa and a 1/3 reduction of United Nations development programs -- these are very alarming figures.

In this unfavorable international context, Lome III will be very difficult to negotiate. I would like to note two opposing dangers, which in reality are complementary. The first is the danger of draining resources, and I am afraid some EEC member countries might limit or reduce their contribution to the functioning of the Lome convention system in the coming years. The second is the dilution of these resources through a sort of universalism which would cause Lome to move out of the framework of the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries and involve itself with Asia or Latin America.

And I am getting closer to the question which was just asked. Europe, including France, does not have the means to be present everywhere in a significant way. We have a priority -- a framework -- which is the Lome convention, -- this solidarity between Europe and Africa. We mean this and France's position on this issue is, first of all, to preserve the achievements of the Lome convention.

[Question] The Third World's debt has reached alarming proportions. Does France have a new initiative in this field?

[Answer] As you have just said, the problem of the debt is so serious that it is not so much a question of rescheduling the debt as of finding general solutions to the transfer of the North's financial flow toward the South, or that of the oil producers toward the nonoil-producing countries. There is therefore a general financial flow to be organized so as to enable the world to financially reestablish itself.

On this point, the Brandt report, which was presented by the former chancellor and which contains recommendations on aid to the Third World as a whole, was too optimistic by stating that it would suffice to write off debts or to increase the flow of aid to the South. It is also necessary to add to this a development strategy aimed, first of all, at reestablishing the capacity to produce energy.

My main concern is not the debtors: Mexico, Argentina and Brazil will always come out of it. Because if they sink, the National City Bank or Hanover Trust Bank would also sink; and this will never happen because the financial community will not allow it to happen. What I especially fear is that this world-wide crisis is hitting the countries that are too porr to borrow. Even if they could borrow, they would not be rich. It is these countries that stand the risk of being left out. At the present time, let us help those that are called the less developed countries, those who today have found themselves in a position of stagnation or recession; they are the ones who stand the risk of being the principal victims of this crisis.

PCF CENTRAL COMMITTEE REPORT ON PRC, DPRK VISITS

[Apparent text of PCF Central Committee "Resolutions on PCF Delegation Visits to PRC and DPRK"]

[Text] The Central Committee and federation first secretaries heard a report from Maxime Gremetz on the course, substance and results of the visit to the PRC by the delegation led by Georges Marchais from 13 through 26 October 1982.

The Central Committee approved the delegation's activity, the lessons that it draws from it and the results to which the talks led, which have been extensively reported to communists and workers by L'HUMANITE. It welcomes the fact that the talks, conducted in an in-depth manner and in a spirit of frankness and friendship, made it possible to reach a restoration of relations between the PCF and CPC based on independence, mutual respect, equal rights and noninterference.

The Central Committee considers it of the utmost importance that both parties were able to calmly discuss the differences of assessment and the divergencies that exist between them and to establish a broad range of convergences concerning the need for each people to find their own road to a socialism conveived on the basis of each country's original conditions and respect for the states' and peoples independence, sovereignty and security; action for peace and disarmament; the pressing need to establish a new world economic order; the development of relations between France and China; and solidarity with the people struggling to free themselves from imperialist rule. The development of solidarity and these shared objectives therefore constitutes a good implementation of the "new internationalism" defined by our 24th congress.

This visit also made it possible to observe the progress made by the socialist society being built by the Chinese people, despite the past tragic errors stressed and combated by the CPC. The realities of this "Chinese-style socialism" at the same time confirm socialism's great diversity and its capacity to answer the most fundamental problems of social development in our time. The Central Committee welcomes the broad cooperation plan adopted by the two parties, whose implementation will permit better mutual familiarization.

The PCF Central Committee heard a report from Maxine Gremetz on the course, substance and results of the visit to the DPRK by the delegation led by Georges Marchais from 26 through 29 October 1982.

The Central Committee approved the delegation's activity, the lessons it has drawn from it and the results to which the talks led, which have been extensively reported to communists and workers by L'HUMANITE. These talks, which took place in a friendly and frank atmosphere, permitted the two delgations to inform each other of their respective policies, both domestic and international.

The Central Committee welcomed the substantial results observed in the building of socialist society since 1953 following the end of the war that destroyed the country. It confirms its solidarity with the South Korean patriots struggling against a fierce dictatorship controlled from a distance by U.S. imperialism, which opposes the country's reunification by every means. It welcomes the decisions taken to strengthen cooperation between the parties on the basis of the principles of independence, mutual respect and solidarity.

FANFANI MEETS WITH BERLINGUER, PCI DELEGATION

[Excerpts] At 1630, Prime Minister-designate Amintore Fanfani began sounding out the parliamentary political forces in an attempt to solve the government crisis. He had a long conversation with the Communist Party [PCI] delegation led by Berlinguer which was the first delegation to be received. The talks lasted over an hour. After the meeting, secretary Berlinguer strongly emphasized one point: The Communist Party wants a government which will last for the entire tenure of the legislature and which is completely opposed to early elections. He added that his delegation outlined to the prime minister-designate the PCI's views which call for a profound change of direction, expecially in economic and social policy. It is necessary to consider the country's problems, not the interests of the parties, Berlinguer concluded.

Gathers Parties' Support

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 18, Optimism was running high today over Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani's chances of forging a viable ruling partnership that would bring Italy's Government crisis to a rapid conclusion.

The leaders of three of the five parties making up a majority in the Parliament have already come out in favor of a cabinet led by the veteran Christian Democrat.

The three parties were the Christian Democrats, the right-of-center Liberals and the Socialists, although the latter also spoke of early elections this spring.

Social Democratic Secretary Pietro Longo was in favor of a solution that would spare Italy any new round of balloting until the legislature comes to its normal end in 1984.

The Republicans are pushing for a government with staying power which is capable of coping firmly and energetically with current political and economic problems.

Fanfani, Senate speaker and premier on four previous occasions, was encouraged in his goverment-formation task by all of the delegations of the major parties that he consulted with yesterday.

Even the opposition Communists, led by Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer, stressed the need for the formation of a government that would avoid the need to call early elections.

Even from the opposition ranks of the extreme right, the "MSI" (neofascist) Party exhorted Fanfani to carry forward his proposed institutional reforms aimed at making the country more governable. "MSI" also urged an eventual Fanfani cabinet to look to public administration and spending right away, as early elections might prove unavoidable.

So far there have been no vetoes or reservations expressed by the five parties that took part in the outgoing government: Christian Democrats (DC), Socialist (PSI), Social Democrats (PSDI), Republicans (PRI), and Liberals (PLI). However, the five do not seem to be in accord as to how long Fanfani's mandate should last.

The PSI leadership Wednesday spoke of a government that should serve as a guarantee in relationship to coming political and administrative elections which could be linked together in 1983.

The outgoing government was led by Republican Giovanni Spadolini, the first non-Christian Democrat premier in Italy since shortly after World War Two. It was a dispute between the DC and the PSI over economic policy that brought down the Spadolini administration. One of the toughest tasks Fanfani will have in the coming days will be that of finding a way to mediate between the DC and PSI lines.

Today the premier-designate meets with his own party which has already given him their full support. Fanfani has stated that his government would work to make the present difficulties more bearable and to cut problems down in both quantity and in duration.

Other goals will be to satisfy the country's aspirations for justice and for economic recovery, jobs and institutional efficiency.

The communist party leadership will also meet today and the secretaries of the various parties will make a first evaluation of the premier-designate's program proposals.

UNION-MANAGEMENT TALKS ON LABOR COSTS SUSPENDED

AU170901 Rome ANSA in English 0804 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, 17 November -- Union-management talks on lowering labor costs and the thorny issue of automatic wage-price indexation were suspended Tuesday. The talks had been resumed after nearly a month to give factory workers time to discuss and vote on a union platform.

"It was nearly a clean break", according to Luciano Lama, secretary general of the CGIL (Communist-Socialist) trade union. Organized labor reacted by announcing a four-hour general strike on November 24.

Speaking for management, Walter Mandelli vice president of the Private Industralists Federation (Confindustria) said that "our positions are very distant. We decided to suspend the negotiations to reflect on the situation. Confindustria gave short shrift to the union platform, dubbing it an "impractical proposal".

The platform, which underwent numerous amendments in factory consultations, calls for a ten percent reduction on automatic quarterly cost-of-living wage adjustments and, in exchange, demands substantial tax relief. According to Confindustria and the public sector management organization Intersind, the unions cannot propose only an insufficient freeze on wage-price indexation, and shift an estimated 20,000 billion lire burden on the state.

[Text] Rome -- [PCI Secretary General] Enrico Berlinguer will attend Brezhnev's funeral. He will be accompanied by [PCI Directorate] Gian Carlo Pajetta and Paolo Bufalini, Meanwhile, the PCI secretary general sent the following telegram yesterday to the CPSU's newly-elected general secretary, Yuriy Andropov: "Please accept the Italian Communists' and my personal congratulations on your election as general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, together with sincere good wishes that in your position of high responsibility you can make an effective contribution to the cause of world peace, the prosperity of the Soviet Union's peoples and the development of socialism."

PCI'S PAJETTA VIEWS BREZHNEV REIGN, LEGACY

[PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta article: "What He Found; What He Leaves Behind"]

[Text] The death of the CPSU general secretary and the president of the USSR is not something that takes the world by surprise. Nobody can have failed to reflect on that life, which seemed about to end, and on what could happen after. Yet the news comes as an event and transcends sorrow and reflections on Brezhnev's personality.

The record of his work is essential in considering the very topical question of whether this death marks the end of a period and what prospects are opening up for the orientation and action of his successor and for the Soviet Union.

I remember that Brezhnev used to emphasize his worker origins, his concern with technology and his personal attention with regard to defense problems. To those who knew him he seemed like a steadfast man, concerned with proceeding cautiously, after Khrushchev's policy had seemed to the leadership group that decided on his dismissal more than daring and bordering on what was called "subjectivism." The worker from Dnepropetrovski, the engineer who trained during the years of industrialization, the commissar on a Ukrainian front during the Great War Against Nazism had already been president of the USSR. Perhaps he was subsequently chosen as party general secretary and became head of state again almost as a guarantee and symbol of the return to a leadership which, while rejecting any Stalinist nostalgia, seemed to fear the risks and consequences of a regeneration involving the USSR's structures and implying a profound change. Such a change was considered to conflict with a tradition and a conception of the very life of the state and party that had become the foundation of the culture and political outlook of party and state cadres in much greater numbers than Khrushchev -- and with him those who hailed the 20th and 22d congresses as events that would involve the whole of Soviet society and create more rapid prospects of regeneration -- could have imagined. Perhaps the principal characteristics of the policy that Brezhnev desired and represented were those of offering his country a guarantee on the domestic plane; and a guarantee of defense from possible attacks and processes that would weaken the socialist camp and its leadership by the USSR -- a supremacy to be defended with actions which we deplored; and it was in this very connection that the sharp conflicts called Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan and Poland emerged.

Nevertheless, the attempt which seemed to concern him most and to which he returned several times was to avert the threat of a war involving the Soviet Union or one that made it an apparently weaker target.

He also tried to make technological progress and economic equilibrium possible so as to prevent the stagnation of social progress, which was considered indispensable, along with a real desire to leave behind promises of Khrushchev's impossible to keep, such as a rapid overtaking of the United States in daily life and in every economic and technological sector.

Though admittedly worried about possible negative outcomes, he seemed less concerned with the need for every liberalization process. He seemed unwilling to recognize as elements in the very cohesion of the party and of the country that demanded them, and in the new requirements facing a more mature society, participation, a thorough examination of the past -- which seemed to us a necessity following the 20th congress -- a freer circulation of ideas and a real democratic development of Soviet life. And though there was no return to the past, this refusal nevertheless was never accompanied by a quest for further development, to the extent that that event (the 20th congress) was regarded virtually as fit to be relegated to the archives and forgotten.

We certainly do not intend to forget that there were differences, divergences and even disputes with our party. But in the same way we judged that even when acts that we condemned and considered dangerous were committed, there was in him the imperative -- which, as far as I can remember, seemed to me personally heartfelt -- to spare his country and therefore the world the nightmare of a war that could imply a nuclear holocaust.

On one occasion he discussed these matters with Longo, Alicata and me at a dinner also attended by my wife. We talked about Vietnam. He told us about the aid and was keen to assure us that everything possible was being given. Then he paused a moment and exclaimed; "There is just one thing we will not do, and that is to wage war." In recent years his exertions became very laborious and the hours that he wrested from his illness became increasingly burdensome. When we saw him at Tito's funeral he already seemed like a symbol of an increasingly difficult. almost impossible, refusal to give in. We remember him in the Piazza San Giovanni at Togliatti's funeral and in Berlin at the communist parties' conference, where he said that he recognized every party's independence, as if admitting that history could not be made to turn back.

Now he has died at a difficult moment, when the contradictions seem to have become more numerous and his difficult task seems not to have been concluded with a definitive action for peace and for the problems confronting his country. We believe that the courage of regeneration and the quest for new ways, without which prudence is certainly impossible, are now more necessary than ever in order to advance. We point out as an expression of our solidarity that his last speech was a sign of a desire to surmount the split with China -- the very split with China that Togliatti deplored back in his Yalta testament.

Comrade Leonid Ilich Brezhnev leaves a difficult legacy, burdened by many problems and weighed down by crisis. But he leaves a country and peoples that have a difficult and harsh experience behind them and that must feel how much responsibility they bear for world peace and for a new international order. Also the responsibility to understand that socialism needs the consensus, participation, democratic life and freedom of every man.

The legacy is not an easy one, but the need to move ahead and to seek new paths must be felt. Our condolences to the communists and peoples of the USSR embody a hope, which is not ours alone, which must not be disappointed.

PCI'S GUISEPPE BOFFA ANALYZES BREZHNEV ERA

PM170805 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 12 Nov 82 pp 1, 20

[Giuseppe Boffa article: "The Record of a Tense, Controversial Era"]

[Text] Leonid Brezhnev led the Soviet Union for 18 years in that political system's most important post -- general secretary of the CPSU -- which was later combined with that of chairman of the Supreme Soviet Presidium, equivalent to our head of state. Now 18 years is a long time: In the history of the USSR only Stalin held maximum power for longer.

It was precisely among the cadres of the Stalinist era, with its profound transformations but also with its convulsions and disturbing tragedies, that Brezhnev cut his military teeth, trained as a leader and acquired experience in posts of increasing responsibility. He gained from this -- as he did from his lengthy cooperation with Khrushchev, to whom he remained very close for many years -- a profound knowledge of the Soviet political and state machine; he became its loyal interpreter when, following Khrushchev's dismissal, he assumed the supreme leadership of the party and later of the state.

The situation that Brezhnev inherited from his predecessor was not simple. Of course the country breathed a much more relaxed atmosphere than the one Stalin had left 11 years earlier. But it was also a beleaguered and tired country, in which new conflicts were emerging. Nevertheless, it can be said that the predominant aspiration was for greater stability; this applied to the party and state leadership machinery, which generally showed little appreciation of Khrushchev's reforms, but also to the country as a whole which, following the enthusiasms and thrusts prompted by the 20th congress, itself failed to properly understand the innovations that Khrushchev tried to introduce continually. There was therefore a certain coincidence of aspirations between the leaders and the led, to which Brezhnev provided the answer and on which he long built his government work.

In its first phase it still experienced a period of cautious reforms and experiments. But above all it produced the desired impression of stability. On the whole, the results were fairly positive. Economic development maintained fairly high levels. Agriculture at last seemed to be on the way to a systematic recovery. The peasants regained an equal status in society. The new emphasis placed on the production of consumer goods led to an improvement in living standards. The USSR even succeeded in bringing its military might closer to that of the United States. The process that came to be called detente began by means of the summit meetings with U.S. Presidents and accords in Europe.

But even then there remained in the background a major unresolved problem, which after all emerged with an obvious impact in earlier years, particularly from the 20th Congress, with its shocking condemnation of the arbitrary acts and obscenities of the Stalinist period -- the problem which in a single word is called democracy, the relationship between the government and the governed, the people's participation in major and minor economic and political decisions. The positive results of the first years may have created the illusion that that problem had successfully been shelved. But it exerted pressure from 1001 sides both within the USSR and in the countries of its international system. The violent repression of the major reform plan drawn up by the Czechoslovak Communists in 1968 marked in this connection the prevalence of an outright conservative tendency both in the USSR and throughout its international alignment, especially with regard to ideology and politics, but with paralyzing effect also on reformist thrusts in the economy.

The effects of these tendencies are never immediate. They become apparent in time. It has already been pointed out in several forums that 6-7 years ago the Brezhnev government's record could be presented under a much more favorable light than it can now. Indeed it was in this latter period that the problems became increasingly exacerbated, almost to the extent of acquiring the proportions of outright crises. But it is legitimate to wonder whether the preconditions for this phenomenon were not created before; for that matter, a not inconsiderable number of indications enabled more attentive observers to predict it.

In foreign policy there was in the mid-seventies a serious error of judgement regarding the problems raised both by progress in detente and by the emergence of the first symptoms of the world economic crisis. There was a clear overestimation of the difficulties that this implied for the opposite camp -- the United States and Western camp as a whole -- and a parallel underestimation of the problems that the same phenomena presented to the USSR and its allies. When the predictable counteroffensive against detente and the advantages that it brought the USSR began, Moscow was therefore able to respond to it no longer with broad peace initiatives, but only with the logic of power politics that lay within the "cold war" sphere. Detente, which had been Brezhnev's greatest success, emerged disrupted as a result.

Even within the country, in the face of increasing pressure from the new and unexpected problems, the conservative thrust tended to take the form of outright stagnation. It was very difficult for new ideas to be announced, at least at the top level. The result was an exacerbation of a whole range of difficulties, starting with economic ones, especially regarding agriculture and food, with the inevitable political repercussions that this involves.

It is difficult to say how far all this should be attributed to Brezhnev personally and how far to the leadership machinery of which he always remained a loyal interpreter and to whose delicate internal balances he always succeeded in devoting great attention. In a sense Brezhnev was actually the least "personal" of all the USSR's top leaders, the one who most reflected the "collegial" face of its leadership group. But this delicate, and now insoluble, point of historical interpretation does not eliminate the major problems that the Soviet situation now displays; domestic problems; as has been seen, but also international problems, which consist not only of the renewed asperity of the conflict with the Reagan administration's expansive policy, but also of the detachment from many other emancipatory forces throughout the world, starting with a considerable number of communist parties.

These are the tasks with which the new Soviet leadership will find itself confronted. Brezhnev's death signifies more than the demise of a man who dominated his country's political scene for so long. The prolonged domestic stability itself led to the aging of the entire leadership group that governed the country with Brezhnev. Suslov died in January and now it is being said that Kirilenko is dying too; they were the two men whom Brezhnev had at his side at the most important functions. The succession problem therefore concerns not only a figure of maxiumum importance -- which is in itself important -- but a whole nucleus of men who for years constituted the USSR's leadership.

PCI'S REICHLIN ON LESSONS OF RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

[Article by PCI Secretariat member Alfredo Reichlin]:

[Text] Today is the 65th anniversary of the October Revolution. Two-thirds of a century separate us from that event which fired the minds of vast human masses, victims of social oppression and war, while it struck all the governments of the time as an absurd and precarious accident.

How could they understand? That event accomplished the most radical break in modern history because it in fact cast doubt on the very idea that there was no horizon beyond the capitalist unverse and that, outside it, there was no other way of conceiving of economic development and social organization. It started a disturbing process which, in the following decades and through unprecedentedly dramatic experiences, reshaped the face of the world. It was certainly not a straight and uninterrupted course. Nor is it true that it was the origin of everything -- of present-day civilization and the new dilemmas facing mankind. We merely say that none of the present -- of the world as it now is and not only the Eastern bloc countries would be comprehensible if such an event were erased.

Thus this talk of "wrenches" and "patching up" is frankly ridiculous. With whom should we break, with history? And how will we be capable of understanding the nature of present-day problems, including the lesson which we learn from great and terrible experiences, unless we hold firm to the course which we are following, which refuses to follow either those who push the tragedies to one side as if they were pure accidents, and those who diabolize the October Revolution as if it had been a historical error? It is true that we have not always reasons so independently. In the past we too frequently saw socialism's events through ideological spectacles. But the problem of transferring the October Revolution from the realm of myth to that of history concerns not only us but everybody.

It is time to end this game of examinees and examiners. But it is also time to stop wearing down the leftwing forces in a dispute on the relative validity of specific political, ideological and state models inspired by the USSR (but is the present Soviet model the same as it was in 1917? And is it the same as in the thirties?) The waning of whose driving force is difficult to deny.

That would mean preventing onself from understanding how, why and in what other directions the mole of this century's major resolutions -- of which the 1917 revolution was the harbinger and motive force -- has dug.

In fact, therefore, to reflect on the vicissitudes of the October, to refuse to "excommunicate" it or treat it as a digression does not in the last imply treating it as a myth, seeing only the gains and not the errors, refusing to draw all the conclusions from the tragedies and harm that stemmed from it. What it does imply is an attempt to better understand the reality and the problems of the modern world. A world that now has many centers, that is terribly unbalanced and in which, though one can no longer talk in terms of a single "thread" of the revolutionary process, neither can one still believe that the "natural" capitalist market laws can resolve the development problem and the more general problem of coexistence among what will in a few years' time be 6 billion people. We must reflect on the real causes of the present crisis, the most serious since the war, and on the reasons for the increasingly disruptive contrast between the North and South of the world.

Hence the need to boldly define the essential traits of the new phase in the struggle for socialism, which is underway worldwide. And to thoroughly reappraise its prospects, its image and its main guidelines, no less, together with the wealth of its new discoveries [determinazioni]; peace, autonomy, the need for a rational administration of resources, new requirements of self-government and democracy. Leaving forms aside, this is the universal value of democracy, which is now inseparable from socialism. Nobody can now presume to impose economic, social and political models. And all the Italian Communists' formulations for a "third way" are clearly a realistic and rational effort to open up new paths and to provide effective answers to the crisis of contemporary societies, including the crises of the East European societies, which are not all the same, but which do constitute a real fact which we do not want to witness passively.

We are nobody's judges. But we are convinced that the socialist movement in both West and East must come to terms with its own experience in the knowledge that it is necessary to reflect on the past but that the most important thing is to examine, with new eyes and new methods, the reality of a world that the revolutionary movements of past decades have largely brought about. Consider the conditions of a peaceful coexistence that can no longer trust to power logics or to the identification of the politicomilitary blocs with class alignments and peace alignments. But this applies to the very conception of the revolutionary process, of its social and political protagonists, of the connections between production relations and forms of political and social democracy, between collective emancipation and individual rights; and the same applies also to the relationship between international solidarity and movements' and states' national autonomy.

In the real conditions of today's world, in which there are no longer besieged or besieging blocs but opposed forces and alignments, decisive importance is assumed, as Togliatti pointed out in the "Yalta memorandum," by the capacity to provide real answers to the real problems of mankind, society and nations.

It is this that determines socialism's image, its legitimacy to present itself as an innovative force, its capacity to show young people hope and the future. If the emphasis falls on a stubborn defense and reproduction of oneself and unless obstacles to the necessary reforms are courageously removed, then even the original lifeblood can dry up.

Revolution is not only a glorious day, but a lengthy and complex process. The test can never be considered over. Only by responding the challenges of the present can it demonstrate its continuity.

ANGOLA ARRESTS CREWMEN FOR TAKING PORT PHOTOS

LD172104 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] Nearly all Portuguese newspapers published today gave great prominence to news about the detention of two crewmen from the ship Alcoutim by the authorities of the Angolan port of Namibe, formerly Mocammedes. Angolan police detained engineers Carlos Claro Dias and Roque Baroa for questioning because the two men took pictures of Namibe where the ship Alcoutim had been unloading freight. It will be recalled that the town of Namibe was attacked by South African commandos a week ago.

The ship belongs to the Portuguese state-owned company Companhia Nacional de Navegacao. Last Monday night, when it was about to sail for Maputo, it was ordered by the Angolan authorities to postpone departure until the film taken by the two crew members had been developed. As the ship's master insisted on the need to proceed on his journey, the Namibe port authorities decided to detain the men in question.

In a communique released in Lisbon this afternoon, Companhia Nacional de Navagacao said it has already approached the Portuguese Foreign Ministry with a request to help solve the problem of the two crewmen held in Angola. Another communique released by the trade union to which the two crewmen from the Alcoutim are affiliated says the Angolan authorities prevented the ship's master from getting in touch with the Portuguese Consulate and Embassy in Luanda.

PCP'S BRITO COMMENTS ON POLITICAL SCENE

PM100955 [Editorial Report] Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 November 1982 publishes on pages 17-18 a 3,500-word Oscar Mascarenhas interview with PCP Political Commission member and Parliamentary Leader Carlos Brito. Brito criticizes various aspects of the revision of the Portuguese Constitution, condemns the Socialist Party leadership's "collaborationism" with the government and expresses his belief in a coming realignment of political forces. He also attributes the PCE's defeat in the Spanish general election to "the situation of great difficulties existing within the PCE," and concludes by commenting on the coming Portuguese local elections.

CUNHAL ON VOTING NONSOCIALIST AT LOCAL ELECTIONS

PM170839 [Editorial Report] Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 4 November 1982 publishes on pages 4-5 the 6,000-word apparent text of a speech by PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal at the 31 October United People's Alliance (APU) national meeting in Lisbon. The speech deals exclusively with the coming Portuguese local elections and the APU's role in them. Cunhal asserts that a vote for the Socialist Party in the elections "is a mistaken vote," and criticizes the Socialists' conduct at the national and local levels, warning against drawing comparisons with the situation in other countries such as Greece, France and Spain.

PSOE ELECTS PARLIAMENT PRESIDENTS; CDU REGROUPS

LD172116 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1730 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Excerpts] The 330 Spanish Soicalist deputies and senators met today in Madrid to organize the parliamentary majority. During the meeting the Socialists approved as candidates to the presidencies of the Congress and Senate the lawyer and lecturer Gregorio Peces-Barba and Jose Federico de Carvajal, respectively. In the Congress presidency, Peces-Barba will replace Centrist Landelino Lavilla, leader of the hitherto governing party, the Democratic Center Union. PSOE Secretary General Feline Gonzalez and Deputy Secretary General Alfonso Guerra both said that the presidency of the parliamentary group would be imcompatible with any responsibility in the government. During his address to the Socialist parliamentary group, Felipe Gonzalez said Parliament is one of the institutions closest to Spanish society. The Socialist leader stressed his party's commitment to achieving change in Spanish society. The new Spanish Congress of Deputies will be constituted tomorrow, which will indicate the legal process of transferring power to the new Socialist government.

The parliamentary group of the hitherto governing party, the Democratic Center Union, also met today. It has been reduced to 12 deputies from the 168 which it had in the previous legislature. It met to decide on its structure and on its vote in the investiture of Socialist Felipe Gonzalez as Spanish prime minister. The latter was left pending at the meeting because it depends on talks between Centrist President Landelino Lavilla and the next president of the Congress of Deputies, the Socialist Gregorio Peces-Barba. Gabriel Cisneros was elected secretary general of the Centrist parliamentary group.

GONZALEZ, CEOE DISCUSS ECONOMIC, LABOR POLICY

PM171047 Madrid YA in Spanish 12 Nov 82 p 8

[Francisco L. de Pablo report: "CEOE Will Cooperate With Socialist Government]

[Text] Some details of the future Socialist government's organization are beginning to take shape. According to what Felipe Gonzalez disclosed to Spanish Confederation of Employers' Organizations [CEOE] Chairman Carlos Ferrer Salat, there will be only one deputy premiership for economy and finance, who will coordinate all the Cabinet's economic portfolios. Together with Alfonso Guerra and Miguel Boyer, who could be the man in charge of this economic and financial deputy premiership, the Socialist leader held a 5-hour meeting on Wednesday evening, which ended at 0245 hours of the morning, with CEOE chairman and deputy chairman, Carlos Ferrer and Jose Maria Cuevas, respectively, to explain the economic policy to them the Socialists intend to carry out in implementation of their program.

According to reliable sources, it was learned through that conversation that the future prime minister's Cabinet will be organized in specialised areas, without "plumbers," seeking to enable the government to act at two levels: a supercabinet or "decision-making kitchen," and the full Cabinet. The aim is to prevent the Cabinet from becoming a small debating chamber and to achieve greater coordination among departments.

The meeting between the employers' leadership and the future prime minister and deputy premier centered on relations between the CEOE and the government, as well as on an exposition and analysis of the economic, labor, trade union and social consultation policy which the Socialist Cabinet intends to implement.

Socioeconomic Agreements After Investiture

The results of this conversation were set out at the meeting of chairmen of CEOE territorial and sector organizations which Ferrer Salat held yesterday morning and at which the basic conclusion was reached to cooperate from a critical stance with the Socialist government, which has already promised to accept the economic and labor agreements reached between employers and trade unions.

Prominent among the economic aims set out by Felipe Gonzalez to his management interlocutors is the ultimate goal of reducing the inflation rate of 8.5 percent over the next 4 years, not increasing the tax burden substantially, maintaining wages' purchasing power and achieving increased productivity, the profits from which could be left in the hands of enterprises to strengthen and increase their investment capacity.

Felipe Gonzalez promised the employers that the public expenditures and deficit will not increase substantially in terms of the GDP; that industrial reconversion will continue, although less intensively than to date; that the recently introduced contractual arrangements, such as part-time contracts, will not be changed; that an attempt will be made to achieve a falling interest rate, or at least to follow the world trend, which will largely depnd on achieving the domestic policy aims being pursued; and that there will be no more price controls than those existing to date.

In the labor and trade union sphere, Felipe Gonzalez told the employers' leadership in a relaxed and cooperative atmosphere that his maximum aim is to support the trade unions in their strengthening and development, but not by budgetary means, but by restoring the historic assets accumulated under the previous regime -- a share-out in which the employers' organizations will also take part. The Socialists' intention as regards the introduction of joint management or generalizing the enterprise trade union sections were not made very clear, unlike their aim of achieving the 40-hour work week and the reduction of the retirement age with the time limits set in their election program.

Need for Joint Effort

In short, the future Socialist government is making sure of the social forces' cooperation before it comes into office. Ferrer Salat stressed to his colleagues that the employers must maintain an attitude of "open dialogue and cooperation toward the Socialist government in order to tackle the major national problems such as unemployment, preventing price increases and enabling Spain to grow again...." "We employers," Ferrer Salat added, "will act impartially, independently, professionally and objectively, because we are convinced that it is necessary to make a joint effort involving all the political and social forces."

The CEOE will also support the alternative measures put forward by the opposition, especially when it comes to negotiating with the government, in order to ensure that the Popular Alliances's parliamentary performance is more constructive and not a mere chorus of lamentations.

DENMARK

REAGAN WILL HAVE TO HEED ANTINUCLEAR REFERENDUM

PM160935 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 5 Nov 82 p 10

[Editorial: "A Signal for Reagan"]

[Text] President Reagan managed well enough in the midterm election to be able to live with its outcome. If it is taken as a referendum on his economic policies -- and he almost made it into this himself -- then it can hardly be said that he lost. It will be a little more difficult for him to steer his financial legislation through the House of Representatives, but he preserved his Senate majority undamaged. However, on one point he did suffer a clear defeat: The referendum on freezing the superpowers' balance of strength went against him.

Voters in 9 states and 30 larger cities were to express their views on the proposals for negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union for a reciprocal and monitored freeze on the development, production and deployment of nuclear arms. This was the same proposal that was voted down in the old Congress by only two votes, and that majority will have been lost in the newly elected Congress. The referendum was consultative, and cannot force President Reagan to take the initiative for nuclear freeze talks with President Brezhnev. Even though the referendum will not have immediate political consequences, the fact that a referendum among one-third of the U.S. voters had such a clear outcome is not without political significance. All the states across the United States where referendums were held supported the nuclear freeze, including California, Reagan's own state, which otherwise provided Reagan with good election results. Only Arizona took Reagan's line. You could say that a very definite stand is needed for a vote against the desire to halt the arms race on reasonable terms, because this is what everyone wants, and on the basis of common human feelings, the very broadly formulated question would have to be answered in the affirmative. One cannot ignore the significance of such a strong undercurrent of opposition to a security policy which openly admits the necessity of reaching a balance of strength at ever higher levels and works to ensure this.

Nor are the doubts a new leftwing phenomenon. They are also affecting the church a great deal at present, both in Europe and the United States. At the moment, the Catholic bishops in the United States are considering a pastoral letter making the production and planned use of nuclear arms a matter of christian conscience. Church of England bishops will debate a report this month which declares the use of nuclear arms to be immoral and condemns a strategy which aims at preventing war by using the threat of nuclear arms, thereby concluding that Britain should abandon its nuclear weapons. The bishops of both countries will probably stop short of establishing a doctrine that would set the church against the state by condemning the Western defense system. However, the mere fact that these ideas are being discussed shows how important they are. Every decade since 1945 a new generation has had to work its way through the ethical problems of nuclear arms on its own terms, for we live in a moral society and the eighties will have to go through the same process as previous decades. This will not lead to the disappearance of nuclear arms, because no superpower would dare to abolish them. However, a president who has to think about reelection in 2 years' time will not be able to avoid responding to what is gaining strength among his people.

STORTING EXPECTED TO VOTE AGAINST FUNDS FOR NATO

[Terje Svabo report: "Labor Party Resolution Against NATO Agreement"]

[Excerpt] "A clear break with our country's commitments to NATO," was how Prime Minister Kare Willoch described yesterday's decision by the Labor Party Storting group not to follow up the NATO 1979 dual decision. The decision means that the Storting will now be split down the middle when the issue is debated 22 November. This means that the broad Norwegian agreement on security questions will have been broken. Labor Party Youth Organization Chairman Egil Knudsen told AFTENPOSTEN: "The Labor Party's left wing is greatly satisfied with what has happened."

At the Labor Party National Executive meeting in October, party Chairman Gro Harlem Brundtland stated that the party did not wish to be party to this fall's followup action on the dual decision. The party wants to wait until the situation in Belgium and the Netherlands is clearer and until the Geneva talks have made further progress. Yesterday, the party's Storting group confirmed this position, and the possibility of a settlement between the Conservative and Labor Parties had to be abandoned.

The Willoch government is guaranteed a majority for this fall's dual decision followup action -- but it will only be a one vote majority. Seventy-eight deputies will vote for funds for NATO, and 77 will vote against.

THATCHER ON SOVIET THREAT, FALKLANDS WAR

LD171238 London PRESS ASSOCIAITON in English 1140 GMT 17 Nov 82

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher today warned NATO governments -- Don't put peace in peril by lowering your defences.

The prime minister told more than 200 parliamentarians from the 16 members fo the Western alliance: "The thesis that one-sided disarmament by the West would reduce international tension is the great illusion of our time." The cost of maintaining peace to the peoples of NATO had been high -- "but it is as nothing to the price we would have to pay if we were to put peace in peril by lowering our defences. Once that happened it would take years to restore them, years during which we should be vulnerable to aggression and threats of aggression."

Mrs Thatcher, stressing every word, added: "Any government which took that risk would have failed signally in its duty to its own people and to the alliance." Britain was committed to the goal of increasing defence spending by around 3 percent per year. "It is no easier for us than for our partners. The conflict between the steep rise in the cost of defence equipment and other demands on the public purse is permanent."

Mrs Thatcher told delegates at the opening ceremony of the North Atlantic assembly at Westminister Hall: "The fact is that if we were to sacrifice defence to the needs of the welfare state, the day might come when we should have neither peace nor freedom, nor be able to provide our people with the schools, the hospitals and all the other elements of a modern civilised state." The assembly was meeting at a time "when the changes in the leadership of the Soviet Union introduce a period of uncertainty." "In the months ahead, we shall judge whether Soviet policies and performances present new opportunities for peace or new dangers to stability," she said. "We shall work for the new opportunities, but the alliance must be ready to respond, whatever the future holds."

There was no greater cause than the defence of the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law -- "and none which requires such constant vigilence. Passive defence of freedom will not do." Mrs Thatcher added: "The struggle for human liberty is unremitting and the threat to it every present. Our commitment to freedom with justice must be equal to the challenge. We have a double duty to protect our own freedom and to maintain a beacon of hope for those men and women everywhere who desire freedom but who are denied it. These are the values for which Britain, earlier this year, fought a bitter conflict in the South Atlantic. We had no doubt that we had to restore individual liberty and a democratic way of life to the Falkland Islanders, and to preserve the international law which the invaders had blatantly flouted."

The Argentine invasion was outside NATO boundaries -- the responsibility to react was Britain's and Britain's alone. "But we received splendid support for our allies, in their public declarations, in their co-operation over economic sanctions, in withholding arms supplies and in many other ways, and Britain will long remember that help and encouragement," said the prime minister. Although NATO could not act collectively outside the area of the alliance, "each of us must discharge his separate responsibilities. In doing so each strengthens all. That was true of our own efforts in the South Atlantic. For if the NATO area is bounded by a line, the Atlantic is not. If we had not acted to repel aggression outside our area, the alliance's resolve to act within it might well have been questioned.

Mrs Thatcher returned to her theme of the Soviet threat saying that the Soviet Union "has ruthlessly sacrificed the wellbeing of her people to the cost of armaments. She has moved to a position of parity with the United States in strategic nuclear weapons and massive superiority in intermediate range nuclear weapons in Europe. In this year alone she has installed a further 132 SS-20 warheads. She has increased her superiority in conventional forces. She has displayed total disregard for human rights and international law in the repression of Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan and the implied threat to Poland, and she has continued to suppress personal liberty within her own borders."

Peace had been kept in Europe only because NATO remained true to its objectives and maintained an effective strategy of deterrents, both nuclear and conventional. "But the more we dislike nuclear weapons - and we all do - the more sense it makes to work for their reduction on both sides, not just on one. The thesis that one-sided disarmament by the West would reduce international tension is the great illusion of our time. It would not; it would increase the danger of conflict. Aggressors are tempted by weakness, but they respect strength. If they see that strength will be maintained, they may reject the path of aggression because its cost to them would be too great. Then they may seek genuinely to co-operate in negotiating disarmament, and that would make the world a safer place."

There was no lack of proposals for arms control, said Mrs Thatcher. "But in the end it is not the weapons which cause war but the people who possess them. If they were ever encouraged to think that a threat would not be met by a firm response, that the will to defend our freedom were weakening, then the peace that has been kept in Europe for so long would truly be at risk."

NATO's watchword must be unity of purpose. Most of the disputes which recently clouded the relationship between Europe and America had been settled. "The Western alliance has again shown that it can rise above passing problems and match the larger needs of the times," she said.

HURD ON PLO, U.K.-U.S.-USSR ROLES IN MIDEAST

PM171451 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 12 Nov 82 pp 52-54

[British Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Douglas Hurd interview with Raghidah Dirgham in New York -- date not given]

[Excerpts] AL-HAWADITH: Your attitude toward the PLO is different from that of the United States. Would this allow you to receive a PLO representative or not?

Douglas Hurd: Yes, our attitude toward the PLO is different. We say that the support the PLO enjoys in the occupied Arab territories and among the Palestinians in general should be taken into consideration in the negotiations. British officials have held several meetings with PLO representatives in many different places in the world, although no British foreign secretary has met with any PLO representative. We expect the PLO to clearly announce that it will abandon violence and pursue the line of political action. We have said before that a clear announcement by the PLO that it will recognize Israel as soon as the latter recognizes the legitimate Palestinian rights will help a lot in solving the Palestine problem. We have seen such a change in the PLO's line in the past few months, but it is not public and clear. Therefore, we believe that the problem still exists and that an important change is still expected.

AL-HAWADITH: Will Britain play a particular role in this field, particularly in view of Foreign Secretary Francis Pym's recent visit to the area? Is this visit the beginning of a British role?

Hurd: We listen to the views of the others and express our views to them. We have no official role. As I said, Pym went to Damascus and Cairo and I went to Amman, but these visits are not part of any kind of intensive or concentrated mediation because what we are talking about is discussions among the Arabs. Certainly when our advice is requested, we give it. We say, for example, please try to agree on one single viewpoint that would enable the Arab world to exploit this development in this promising U.S. attitude. There should be reconciliation between Reagan's peace plan and the Fes summit resolutions. However, I do not think that Britain or the EEC group will make any official move or produce a new official declaration or invitations to attend a conference. I do not think that we will intervene officially. We have friends, the French have friends and so have the Germans, the Italians and others, and I believe that we will find some way to encourage our friends to narrow the gap between Reagan's plan and the Fes resolutions in order to reconcile the two.

AL-HAWADITH: Once again I would like to go back to a question I asked before. Britain and the EEC, since the Venice declaration, have been accused of failing to take any executive or follow-up steps to the declaration, being content to sit on the sidelines waiting for whatever steps the United States might take, however slow these may be. In fact you are now choosing to play a supporting role for whatever steps Washington may take. What is your answer to these accusations?

Hurd: In Venice, the Europeans adopted their stand· it was a stand of principle. If the declaration is reread today it is clear and understood. I would not change one word in its content after the Venice conference. The Arabs came to us carrying two types of questions. Some of them asked when we will change completely from the U.S. position and do something serious and opposed to it. Others asked when we will begin influencing the United States and when we will contribute to changing its policy. For years after the Venice conference we tried to give advice to the United States, and so did others like the Egyptians and the Saudis. We are now content with the change that has occurred -- the development in the U.S. policy in the direction we want. We do not consider this change as the end of the road. We are still in contact with the United States and are trying to increase the change in its policy.

The U.S. role is definitely vital and fundamental for the peace process. As for the Soviets, they are not fundamental. Israel and the Arabs are fundamental for reaching a certain success. In the light of this reality, I believe that it is better for the Europeans to use their influence as much as they can in order to influence the United States, the Arabs and Israel instead of creating a fourth position. I do not think that a European position in particular can be effective and influential. Such a position might generate press headlines but a European policy quite separate and contrary to the U.S. policy cannot be useful. This is my view and I believe that most of the Arabs agree with me.

AL-HAWADITH: You have belittled the role of the Soviet Union and said that it is not fundamental. Do you see any need for a Soviet role in the search for peace in the Middle East?

Hurd: The Soviet Union is a permanent member of the Security Council and I believe that in the end, if any agreement is reached, it will be asked to endorse it and adopt it as a permanent Security Council member state. I must say that the role the Soviet Union played recently in the Middle East was negative. It does not seem at all that it has participated in the search for a peaceful solution to the Middle East problem. In the meantime, it did not give adequate aid to the Palestinians. Therefore, I believe that its role was negative.

AL-HAWADITH: What do you mean by negative role?

Hurd: If we talk about its attitude toward the Venice declaration or the Egyptian-Israeli peace agreement or any other agreement we find that its attitude was negative. It has put forward views regarding an international conference which I believe it knew in advance were not realistic.

AL-HAWADITH: Why not realistic?

Hurd: Because the United States and Israel will never go to such a conference at present and I believe that the Soviet Union's proposals were unrealistic and its participation was negative. This is how it is now and I do not think that it has anything to say in particular on this subject.

AL-HAWADITH: Israel did not accept Reagan's plan nor the Fes resolutions. For its part, the PLO did not accept the Reagan plan. Don't you think that you are being unfair by saying that the Soviet Union is negative and so is Brezhnev's plan because it is not accepted by the United States and Israel, while Reagan's plan is not accepted even by Israel?

Hurd: Anyone following the situation in the area knows that the Reagan plan stands some chance. I am not necessarily overly optimistic, but I think the Reagan plan stands some chance because U.S. participation in the peace process is necessary and I think that the Arabs accept this. This acceptance is not matched by acceptance of a Soviet role, which cannot be the same role the United States is playing. In reply to your question, I think that the majority, whether they are supporters of the Soviet Union or not, say that the Soviet role in the area in the past months was not effective.

AL-HAWADITH: A few weeks ago, contacts were held with your government in order to discuss the possibility of Britain participating in the multinational force which President al-Jumayyil asked to be increased. Is your government still considering the matter?

Hurd: No. No representative of any government contacted us. There were ideas about this subject and we adopted a stand [as published]. We wish this force success in its role. We think that it is doing a good job in Beirut. We wished to see the UN forces there and we voted at the Security Council for expanding the area of their operation. We are ready to discuss any idea to increase their tasks because they can carry out more tasks in the south. If the Lebanese president asks us and affirms to us the need for Britain's participation, we would look into the matter in one way or another. We have many obligations, particularly in the Falklands and elsewhere. Therefore, the decision will not be easy, but we will look into the matter in relation to its importance.

UN REPRESENTATIVE GOBBI INTERVIEWED ON TALKS

[Text] In an interview with the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, referred to the intercommunal talks and other issues pertinent to a peaceful solution of the Cyprus issue. To a question on his assessment of the present situation after 2 years of intercommunal talks under his auspices, Mr Gobbi answered:

During these 2 years we had two different periods. The first one is the one which I call the period of parallel monologues. It was quite frustrating to see both sides clinging to previously stated positions and repeating all their arguments. We must say that during this period there was no dialogue. Then the evaluation document came to the forefront. The advantage of the evaluation document was that we encouraged true dialogue. It was a work method to encourage dialogue, and we have achieved this. Now we can precisely determine the points where there are differences or identity of views.

Mr Gobbi was then asked: Are you happy with the results? He replied: Happiness is a very subjective concept. I think that this is an indispensable prerequisite in order to build the future. You have to know the obstacle. You have to face the facts and then you can build something.

In answer to another question on the main obstacle to a solution [of the Cyprus issue] during this period, he said:

The main obstacle was that we have not resolved the necessary philosophical confrontation. This is the main obstacle. I think that these confrontations were created on the level of principles and we must proceed to another stage which is more creative and with a more realistic approach.

To a question on the objective of the new round of talks and what is expected from them, Mr Gobbi replied:

As a matter of fact, we are continuing the talks, and this period that is called the new round of talks will be the last period of reciprocal observation. Next year we must reach a definitive period. Then we will need to make many political decisions.

Mr Gobbi was asked: You spoke about decisions. What is truly needed to achieve substantive progress in the dialogue?

He replied: What we need to achieve substantive progress in the dialogue is reciprocal understanding and a political will which will precede political decisions. Both leaderships also need more courage to face criticism because political decisions entail advantages as well as disadvantages. The two leaderships should understand that this give and take entails sacrifices and they should have enough courage to face criticism.

In answer to a question on whether he considers that in the past there was no political will for a solution, Mr Gobbi said:

I think that there is a psychological phenomenon in Cyprus which is mutual mistrust. It reminds me of a boxing match where during the first moments both opponents notice the movements of each other with lack of trust in order to determine the techniques of the other. I believe that this is the case [in Cyprus]. We must end this period of mutual observation and reach political decisions in order to reach the moment of truth.

As special representative of the UN secretary general, what do you think is the reality in the Cyprus issue? Mr Gobbi answered:

Reality for me is a fair and lasting solution of the Cyprus issue. This is truth for me. On the political view it is a coordination of the interests of both communities. If you understand their needs and necessities and if they understand your needs and the harmonizing of these two views becomes possible then you will have a steady and prosperous community.

Asked if he thinks that the withdrawal of all foreign troops and particularly the Turkish invasion troops could facilitate this solution, he replied:

I am in favor of a peaceful solution and not a military solution. This is my very clear answer to this problem. But I think that the evaluation document envisages the possibility of the troops' withdrawal. The withdrawal of the troops is one of the goals of the evaluation document because one of its points is the demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus. I am in favor of the withdrawal of all troops, not only in Cyprus but from all world areas where troops are on foreign territory. But I think that a political solution will help in this withdrawal; now, whether this is set up as a prerequisite or after a political solution, it has some importance. However, the main goal is to achieve this aim.

To another question on how he feels about the replacement of the Turkish troops by a UN peace force in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi replied:

You know I cannot be against the presence of UN troops in Cyprus because the UN force is in favor of peace and therefore I am completely in favor of this UN presence. The point is that I cannot decide on this problem. The Turkish Cypriots should decide on whether or not this presence is enough for their security.

Is the United Nations ready for such a move if it is asked, Mr Gobbi was finally asked, and he replied:

You know the United Nations is ready to make any step that can contribute to the quest for peace.

Official Rejects Gobbi Remarks

NC171926 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Text] The government spokesman, who was requested to comment on the interview with the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation by Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, made the following statement:

The Cypriot Government does not intend to comment on all the unfortunate points of Mr Gobbi's interview, who voiced views with which it disagrees. But it particularly points out Mr Gobbi's statement that it is up to the Turkish Cypriots to decide whether or not the replacement of the Turkish occupation troops by a UN peace force would be enough for their security. This statement is totally unacceptable. The Cypriot Government's stance, which is also in agreement with the UN resolutions, is that the presence of Turkish occupation troops is completely impermissible and constitutes a continuous violation of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Cyprus, an UN member state. The spokesman added: Moreover, the presence of occupation troops constitutes a danger to all the Cypriot people, including the Turkish Cypriots who are also suffering from this presence. Beyond this, it cannot be maintained that the presence of occupation troops provides security to the Turkish Cypriots. If there is security problem, this concerns all the Cypriot people and can be faced with the presence of a UN peace force and the withdrawal of the occupation troops.

Gobbi Clarifies Remarks

[Excerpt] Mr Gobbi yesterday made the following clarification to one of our editors on the point in his statement that referred to the presence of Turkish troops in Cyprus and the strengthening of the UN force:

"I fully support the presence of UN troops in Cyprus. I cannot decide on the question of the presence or withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus because this is beyond my jurisdiction. As you know, on some occasions, the Turkish Cypriots expressed the view that the presence of Turkish troops in Cyprus is necessary for their security.

"With my statement I did not take any stand on this issue. I only gave a picture of the facts," Mr Gobbi concluded.

PAPER CITES UN ON TERRITORIAL ISSUE DIFFICULTIES

NC170938 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 17 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Discussion of the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue was expected to start at tomorrow's intercommunal talks but information available to us indicates that serious difficulties continue to exist -- both procedural and in essence -- against commencement of the discussion. This is concluded from statements made yesterday to our newspaper by UN circles in Nicosia, who ruled out commencement of the discussion of the territorial issue at tomorrow's meeting.

Particular efforts are being exerted by Gobbi, the UN representative here, in his effort to raise these difficulties both at the negotiations table as well as in private meetings with the two interlocutors, Mavrommatis and Onan.

Gobbi had private meetings with the two interlocutors the day before yesterday. A statement issued by Mavrommatis' bureau said "the meeting fell within the framework of consultations related to the ongoing intercommunal dialogue." Turkish Cypriot newspapers, on the other hand, referring to the Gobbi-Onan meeting, reported that afterward the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor stated that it was agreed that only one, instead of two meetings, would be conducted each week.

UN circles told I ELEVTHEROTIPIA that nothing fundamental emerged from these meetings and added that Gobbi will continue sounding the positions of the two sides on matters under discussion in the negotiations.

Answering a question on reports published about an imminent initiative by UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar, the same circles stated that in the interim the time is not ripe for making statements, at this stage, on an initiative by the UN secretary general.

In conclusion, the UN circles said that pending matters before concluding the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus issue would be discussed at tomorrow's meeting.

Agreement Reported

NC180947 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 18 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Further to our yesterday's reports that there are difficulties at the talks in opening the discussion of the territorial aspect, later reports add that a specific formula has been promoted by Mr Hugo Gobbi in removing the difficulties mainly brought up as a matter of procedure by the Turkish side.

The two sides are said to have already accepted this formula.

According to our information, the formula provides for summing up the discussions on the constitutional aspect, pointing out the results of these discussions concerning the rapprochement between the two sides on specific points.

The two interlocutors are expected to deal with this question, that is, summing up the constitutional aspect, at the negotiating table today.

After overcoming the difficulties for the discussion, Mr Gobbi has become intensively active with private meetings in the past 2 weeks with Mr Mavrommatis and Mr Onan.

Following the above mentioned development, reliable circles yesterday expressed the conviction that discussion of the territorial aspect will begin at the Ledra Palace next week.

It is understood that the promotion of the formula for the discussion of the territorial aspect was the subject of yesterday's meeting between Mr Gobbi and Mr Mavrommatis held at the latter's office. As is known, one instead of two meetings a week will henceforth be held while, at the same time, Mr Gobbi will be holding more private meetings with the interlocutors.

ULUSU RETURNS TO ANKARA FROM MOSCOW; COMMENTS

[Text] Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen returned to Ankara today after attending President Brezhnev's funeral in Moscow. Prime Minister Ulusu was received at Esenboga Airport by State Minister and Deputy Primister Zeyyat Baykara. Also present were administrative and military officials as well as the Soviet ambassador to Ankara.

In a statement at the airport, Ulusu said he extended the condolences of President Evren, the government and the Turkish people to the Soviet officials. Ulusu said that he held a useful meeting with Soviet Premier Nikolay Tikhonov. He then expressed the belief that the goodneighborly and friendly relations between the two countries, which were based on the principles of mutual respect and noninterference in each other's internal affairs, would be further developed.

Asked whether he intended to take part in the cadres of political parties in the future, Ulusu said that he was not considering that at the moment but that he might do so if the country's interests necessitated it and if he became convinced that it was his duty to do so. The prime minister stressed that he had expressed his views on the matter before.

ULUSU ISSUES CIRCULAR ON MAPS OF AEGEAN BORDERS

NC180847 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 14 Nov 82 p 12

[Text] Ankara (CUMHURIYET news desk) -- The prime minister's office has asked official and private establishments not to permit the printing of wall maps, geographical atlases and tourist and road maps showing the Turkish and Greek territorial waters in the Aegean in different colors or lines delineating borders.

In a circular Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu sent to the ministers and auxiliary establishments, he pointed out that although there are certain accepted provisions between Turkey and Greece, there are no sea borders or territorial waters drawn on a map, and yet certain border lines contrary to this appear on maps and atlases.

The territorial waters of Turkey and Greece in the Aegean are limited to 6 miles. Since Greece claims territorial waters extending 6 miles around its Aegean islands, in some places where the distance between the Turkish coast and the islands is very narrow it can be seen that the territorial waters of the two countries are concentric.

Another issue is related to the international waters which lie on the western side of the Greek islands.

On some maps, a line between Turkey and Greece, starting from the land border in the north runs toward the south and it is shown as the sea border between Turkey and Greece. We encounter the same situation on the western side of the Greek islands. All these areas are shown as Greek territorial waters.

In order to ensure that the Aegean Sea borders are not defined and that our territorial waters are correctly shown Turkish maps, private and official establishments must seek approval from the National Defense Ministry's General Directorate of Maps to print maps.

FRG'S GENSCHER TO VISIT ANKARA 20 NOV

TURKMEN GIVES INTERVIEW ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

NC180742 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 14 Nov 82 pp 1, 4

[Interview granted by Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen to MILLIYET correspondent Mehmet Ali Birand -- date and place not given]

[Excerpts] Question: In what direction will our relations with Europe develop now that the referendum is over? More specifically, what do you expect from Europe?

Answer: Looking at it from the Council of Europe's standpoint, no disruption occurred in our relations with the Council at the governmental level after 12 September. Naturally, the referendum constitutes an important stage from the point of view of eliminating our differences. As a matter of fact, we have observed this week in Strasbourg that the referendum has positively impressed the parliamentarians and the ministers. The great support which the referendum secured has had an enormous effect in this.

Question: What do you expect now? For example, will they abandon the human rights case?

Answer: Naturally, from the Council of Europe's point of view, not all issues have been resolved. Some countries divide the issues in two. There is not much left to be said about the transition to democracy. However, the issue has a human rights aspect also. This will be heard at the trial initiated by the five countries. They say "we expect Turkey not to view this case as an act of hostility and to fully participate in the procedures of the trial." But in this case they make no concessions to Turkey, nor do they present any proposals.

Question: Does Turkey expect the five countries to close this case and withdraw their complaints?

[Answer: Withdrawing this case would be the sensible thing to do: But it would be too optimistic to expect all the countries to act sensibly. I do not imagine that they will give up this case, so we are carefully examining the matter from our own angle.

Question: Can you say that now that the referendum is over; that in the period ahead the Turkey-Council of Europe relations will show a marked improvement?

Answer: I think we can. This is the impression we have formed in the recent meetings.

Question: Could the parliamentarians' wing procure a resolution in January for the complete expulsion of Turkey from the Council?

Answer: If they did, they would be seriously contradicting themselves, Wouldn't it be strange if they attempted to do at this stage what they haven't done so far?

Question: In recent weeks and months it has been argued that the United States is engaged in various preparations concerning the Rapid Deployment Force (RDF) in Turkey. The U.S. press carries reports on it.

It is rumored that a new base will be constructed in Mus. Whether we like it or not, this increases doubts that the famous RDF, which is the current topic of the day, could come to Turkey. Will a new base be established in Turkey for bilateral purposes, or only within the framework of NATO?

Answer: The establishment of a new base in Turkey is out of the question. The modernization of the other installations, on the other hand, will be carried out within the framework of the economic and defense cooperation agreement signed 2 years ago and in accordance with NATO plans. This is confined to the improvement of the existing installations in Turkey. They are to be improved so as to meet the existing needs.

Question: Will there be additional construction at the present installations?

Answer: What if there will be? Is there anything to prevent it?

Question: Where will the funds come from:

Answer: They will come from NATO's infrastructure.

Question: No, no such funds have been earmarked in NATO's infrastructure. What is more, there is no money in their budgets either.

Answer: What if there is not. The whole question is for this modernization to be included in NATO's defense. Turkey has not undertaken any mission outside NATO.

Question: And yet, such a hypothesis can come to mind and in fact, it does....

Answer: As a matter of fact, the absence of such an undertaking is clear from the situation. A statement was issued after the NATO defense ministers' conference. Every state is required to decide itself on its responsibilities outside the region. Our cooperation is purely within the framework of NATO.

Question: Let us also reason it out this way: Some bases are being modernized. They are being extended. These supplementary installations are very important. They include dormitories, fuel and ammunition depots....

Answer: It is all about the modernization of certain airfields. That is all.

Question: Just a moment, the Turkish and U.S. pilots will carry out joint take-off and landing exercises.....

Answer: We are doing that all the time....

Question: Isn't it absolutely natural to think that following the completion of the modernization work, these airfields could be used by the RDF?

Answer: Who is concerned that these bases become operational? It does not necessarily mean that if the capacity of an installation becomes fit for other purposes as well, that installation is not fit for use by NATO also. These installations conform to the defense plans of NATO and they can also be used for other purposes if they need arises. But the whole matter is the absence of an undertaking. Otherwise, even the present installations could be used by the RDF.

Question: In other words, what you are saying is this: We are modernizing the bases but we have no undertaking that they should also be used for other purposes. Is that it?

Answer: Our plans do not make any provision for the use of them by the RDF outside the NATO region. But all the existing installations could be used for a force of this kind, if the need arises. The use of all these installations by this type of force is thinkable. What I am saying is that we are not involved in any such undertaking. Anything can be used by the RDF. This could happen not only in Turkey but in other countries also. It could be done in Greece and Italy as well. This does not, however, necessarily mean that these installations will be used. We have never discussed the question of RDF with the Americans. The Americans have made no proposals whatsoever in connection with the RDF.

Question: Now that we are discussing Cheysson and the European peace force for Cyprus, [as published] I would like to mention a recent rumor: It is being said that Turkey may join the Beirut peace force. Is this in the offing?

Answer: We have not been approached on this matter.

Question: What if such an approach were made?

Answer: We would examine it....

Question: Are the statements frequently repeated by honorable Papandreou regarding the "Turkish threat" contrary to the spirit of the moratorium? He told me that he did not think they are. He said he is merely expressing the feelings of the Greek people. It appears that under the moratorium we understand one thing and the Greeks another. What is your comment?

Answer: Honorable Papandreou has made a very interesting comment which means that he can talk and we must keep quiet. This is out of the question. Let me tell you something. Do you know how best to describe the thing called moratorium by the Greeks? Not to make the statements that Honorable Papandreau makes.

Our attutide is this: We have not felt the need for such an exercise in order to hold negotiations with Greece. As far as we are concerned, when two countries are at variance, the first thing they do is to hold talks to eliminate these differences. Talks usually indicate the presence of a dispute. With this objective in mind, we have not advanced any preconditions for talks.

Question: I am highly curious to know what you are going to discuss at your meeting with the Greek foreign minister in December? For example, Papandreou says that there is no need to bring up the question of the Aegean continental shelf at this meeting. His attitude is very clear.

Answer: I have never known Honorable Papandreou to make any clear statements. At times he talks like this and at other times he agrees to talk. I am not going to tell you that I am going to this meeting with any great hopes. We do not cherish great hopes. We do not have an atmosphere of optimism. But because there are serious issues between us, we must avail ourselves of every opportunity to discuss them.

Question: These talks have been going on since 1947 without any tangible progress. Isn't it true that the status quo serves Athens better?

Answer: Both sides conceal their attitudes on this matter. There is also a Bern agreement to be considered. This agreement emphasizes the need to settle this issue. Let me tell you something; the settlement of the continental shelf issue was very difficult with the former [Greek] Government also. There were great differences between the views of both sides. That is why we tried the method of gradual improvement. We tried to resolve the airspace issue first, but not with much success.

Question: Turkey has presented Greece with a very nice bouquet by signing the Rogers agreement and accepting Greece's return to the military wing of NATO. We had certain expectations in return. General Rogers had made promises. The agreement stipulated that areas of responsibility in the Aegean would be readjusted. Athens subsequently declared that it did not recognize that Rogers agreement. Everybody kept silent. Now no action is being taken either by NATO or Rogers. Everything has been forgotten. Shall we just sit and wait?

Answer: It seems that it is not possible to reach an agreement with Greece on this matter.

Question: I beg your pardon, sir, but such things, that is renouncing agreements, may be possible individuals. Can it also happen between states?

Answer: Yes, it can happen between states also. It is happening, as you see.

Question: Will Turkey sit and watch with its hands tied?

Answer: There is no such thing any more as command control region. There is no the slightest rule. There isn't the slightest basis. It is being handled by completely transitional measures.

Question: Talking of Rogers, how do you find the general's suggestion that through the latest strategy, conventional arms should be increased?

Answer: I have found it very positive.

Question: You will shortly be making a trip to the Soviet Union. What will the framework of this trip be?

Answer: The date has not yet been fixed. But I can say that our relations with the Soviet Union are quite suitable for such a trip. The aim of this visit is to contribute to the development of goodneighborly relations.

Question: The Turkish authorities have started saying that the Soviet Union is behind the Armenian terrorism. Will this not create some discomfort?

Answer: We have not said this. We have never openly accused the Soviet Union of this. We have said that there were many focuses supporting Armenian terrorism. This is obvious.

Question: Is there any concrete proof in the hands of the Turkish state as to the sources that support Armenian terrorism?

Answer: We have some proof, naturally.

Question: Do these data indicate that both the East and the West are implicated?

Answer: Will you please pardon me for not going into details on this matter.

Mehmet Ali Birand: Thank you.

Itler Turkmen: I thank you, too.

CHANCELLOR KOHL INTERVIEWED ON U.S. VISIT

DW181209 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 17 Nov 82

[Interview with Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Kleinmann; date and place of interview not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] You have assured the Americans that they can rely on their German friends. Was this the basis from which you were able to advise the U.S. President to seek direct contacts with the new Soviet general secretary?

[Answer] That is certainly not the precondition for the President's decision. After all, he must make his own decision. Still, it is very important for the Americans to know that they have good and loyal friends in Europe and in Germany. The Americans are a world power; they must undertake action in many areas on behalf of others, including us. During the past several years, they have nearly always been criticized for having shared in the responsibility of others. It is quite normal for them to note with pleasure that they have reliable friends. This is a matter of importance to the Americans.

[Question] Are your talks with the Americans also the reason why you are optimistic about the Geneva disarmament negotiations?

[Answer] Well, all the time -- in any event, during the period of a few weeks in which I have been FRG chancellor -- I have had an opportunity to obtain information which shows me that the Americans, also in our behalf, are negotiating quite seriously and resolutely. The talks with the President, the secretaries of state and defense, and the most important security policy advisers made it quite clear, above all, that these people also see the dimensions of the threat to peace and the dimensions of the weapons involved in these negotiations, and that they are aware that these are not just any negotiations, but negotiations regarding life and death. It is important to the Americans for us to stand by both parts of the NATO dual decision. I have made it absolutely clear that both parts presuppose that the Americans also view the negotiating part of the decision very seriously and implement it in practical policy.

Press Reviews Visit

DW181303 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 18 Nov 82

[From the Press Review]

[Text] In connection with the conclusion of the chancellor's visit to the United States, the BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG says: Helmut Schmidt was able to address the Americans on television in fluent English and to negotiate with Ronald Reagan without an interpreter. Even so, the wall between him and our most important ally rose constantly higher, and the climate became continuously colder. During his first appearance in the United States as FRG chancellor, Helmut Kohl always had an interpreter with him. The Americans still understood him, just as he endeavored to understand them. He thus succeeded in creating the atmosphere of cordiality which traditionally characterized German-American relations during the Adenauer era and which created the preconditions for solving and overcoming even difficult problems and conflicting interests in a spirit of understanding. The chancellor managed to again open wide a door which had been almost dangerously shut. This is a quotation from the BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG.

The FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE states: The striking political fact is the ability of the new chancellor to act with less inhibition as the one representing the majority of the Germans who hold far fewer reservations toward the U.S. protective power than did a part of the constituency of the preceding government.

If anything made Hulmut Schmidt's dealings with the United States increasingly more difficult, it was his declining political credit and not the persistence with which he sought to convince the Americans of his allegedly better perception of the situation. To an increasing degree, he was unable to counteract the impression that the leftwing of his party was trying gradually to move the entire party to an anti-Atlantic line.

Here is an excerpt from an editorial from the Oldenburg NORDWEST-ZEITUNG: By going to Washington, Kohl has done German policy a good turn. It was all the easier to objectively discuss controversial issues without fear of renewed irritations in the U.S.-German relationship after he had shifted the common basic principles of Bonn and Washington into the center of the talks, brought the weight of the new majority along on his visit to the United States, and thus created confidence. This should also true for the future because differences between Washington and its West European partners seem to be programmed in even after the lifting of the U.S. sanctions in connection with the European-Soviet natural gas pipeline deal.

The FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: Helmut Kohl's solicitation of American friendship sometimes came close to toadying. He behaved as if he had to correct something that his predecessor Helmut Schmidt and his social-liberals had unbalanced. However, Schmidt would not have been said farewell to with such great respect by U.S. politicians and journalists if anyone harbored doubts about his reliability and profound affection for the American people. During his visit to Washington, Kohl used the methods of psychotherapy. The question is, however, who was treating whom.

We read the following comment in SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG: Kohl probably wanted his visit to be viewed as more than just a good will tour aimed at improving feelings between the two countries, making things look brighter and purging the atmosphere of irritations. If we view this visit as an attempt to make the Americans gradually grow used to the fact that they are no longer dealing with a chancellor who constantly criticizes the West's leading power and poisons the climate by his know-it-all attitude, then Kohl may consider his visit a success.

KOHL WOULD WELCOME EARLY VISIT BY GROMYKO

[Text] Bonn, 18 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl would "expressly welcome" an early visit to Bonn by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. In the ARD program, "TV Discussion" on Thursday evening he said that there are indications that Gromyko might still come to the FRG in December. Against the background of his U.S. trip, the chancellor emphasized his view that it is necessary to display the FRG's position in a sensible manner toward East and West. This self-evidently includes contacts with Moscow.

Since taking office, he has already had a number of talks with Soviet representatives, Kohl said. He also expressed his interest in a visit to Moscow, but added that a date before the planned Bundestag elections on 6 March is highly unlikely.

However, the chancellor decisively rejected the idea that the FRG could play the role of intermediary or interpreter between the two power blocs in the East and West. "Those shoes are too big for us," he said. Also with a view to the Geneva disarmament negotiations, the chancellor emphasized "we are a part of the North Atlantic Alliance and do not stand between the blocs." He expressed the conviction that the United States takes the negotiations in Geneva "very seriously." Kohl said that the FRG is being kept well informed by the United States and pointed out that U.S. chief negotiator Paul Nitze will inform Bonn again on Friday of the current situation.

Visit at Beginning of 1983

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 18 Nov (DPA) -- According to Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko will visit the Federal Republic "at the beginning of next year." In the ZDF television program "Citizens Ask, Politicians Reply," Genscher said this evening that at such a meeting, the dialogue with the USSR could be continued and it would be possible to establish "whether progress is possible -- and if so, where." It is for this reason that Bonn has "once again" invited the Soviet foreign minister to Bonn.

DIE ZEIT VIEWS LIFTING OF PIPELINE SANCTIONS

DW181059 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 19 Nov 82 p 18

[Commentary by JR: "Carrot and Stick"]

[Text] AEG boss Duerr can now again go to the United States without having to fear that he might be jailed by some sheriff. Now that President Reagan has lifted the sanctions against the firms participating in the construction of the Soviet gas pipeline, AEG-Kanis and the other licensees of U.S. patents can hope that the rubles will start rolling in smoothly again.

The U.S. President said the reason for his decision was that Washington had succeeded in reaching agreement with its alliance partners on a "tougher and more effective" strategy in dealing with Moscow. Reagan is thus following the line of Secretary of State Shultz, who considers embargoes and sanctions to be an inappropriate means to enforce political goals.

It is not yet clear what will replace the sanctions. The allies have obviously not yet agreed on a fixed arrangement as a framework for East-West trade. The government in Paris has made it clear that so far France is refusing to consent to such a framework agreement.

In the usual French manner, Paris is doing things its own way. The French are particularly reluctant to bind themselves to limiting loans and interest subsidies in East-West trade. The stubborn attitude of the Mitterrand government shows that the agreement designed by Shultz not only serves to help Ronald Reagan save face; much rather Washington is trying to convince its allies that two means are necessary in dealing with Moscow: the carrot and the stick.

Embargo 'Flop of Year'

[Commentary signed RB: "Flop of the Year"]

[Text] The U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union in connection with the pipeline deal can now probably be recorded in history books as the political flop of the year. Eleven months after the imposition of the natural gas-pipeline embargo, the "natural" order has been restored in America's foreign relations: business first and then policy. The current "pilgrimage" of 200 leading U.S. businessmen to Moscow is self-explanatory.

In fact, this order has probably never been seriously upset, not even during the sanctions phase. The attempt to prevent Soviet natural gas supplies can easily be interpreted as a policy to promote exports of the United States' own coal and gas. It has now been agreed with the Europeans that no new natural gas delivery contracts will be concluded with the Soviet Union until a common Western study of alternative energy supply possibilities is completed.

In this way, Washington hopes to do more business in supplying its own coal and natural gas to Europe.

A motive for the boycott of technological products such as computers may well also have always been the intention to exclude the East bloc as a possible competitor on the world market of high quality finished goods. There is every indication that the lifting of the sanctions largely amounts to a retreat by Washington. The planned intensification of export controls on strategically important goods will also depend in the future on the good will of the individual Western governments, and in view of growing unemployment, will probably be handled rather generously. The coordination of loan policies which was also announced had already been effected by the international commercial banks; because of the risks involved, all banks are meanwhile equally reserved about loans to the East.

The stagnation of East-West trade during recent months is certainly not attributable to Reagan's harrassing maneuvers. On the contrary, the stepped-up U.S. grain deliveries have prevented a total decline. Detente policy based on the pocketbook increasingly appears to be a stabilizing factor.

GENSCHER BRIEFED ON GENEVA MISSILE TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 19 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher was briefed today on the state of the American-Soviet negotiations in Geneva on medium-range missiles by the American chief negotiator, Ambassador Paul Nitze. Genscher expressed his thanks for the continued intensive briefing and his satisfaction at the earnestness with which both sides are conducting the negotiations and at the fact that progress had been made in Geneva in defining substantive questions.

Genscher said the Federal Government expected the Soviet side to seriously examine and accept the West's offer of a complete renunciation of land-based medium-range missiles on both sides, because this would mean that a real breakthrough had been achieved for the first time in an area of arms control. Such a breakthrough would also have a positive effect on other areas and would meet the desires of the peoples of Europe for nuclear disarmament.

SPD CALLS FOR USSR, U.S. DISARMAMENT MOVES

[Text] Kiel, 18 Nov (DPA) -- The SPD has stressed the Federal Republic's demand that the great powers achieve nuclear disarmament by way of negotiations. The "Kiel declaration" published today at the SPD federal conference also states that the SPD will urge the Soviet Union to move on the question of the disarmament of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe and will continue to ask the United States to make the greatest efforts to render the deployment of such new weapons in Western Europe superfluous. With the policy of agreed progressive disarmament toward approximate balance, the SPD is seeking a partnership for security.

The declaration takes up in concentrated form the 12 reference points for the future policy of the Social Democrats listed by Helmut Schmidt in his last speech to the Bundestag as federal chancellor on 1 October. The declaration, which is to be adopted in Kiel tomorrow, also highlights the struggle against unemployment and the SPD's claim to political leadership in the Federal Republic.

'Kiel Declaration' Adopted

[Text] Kiel, 19 Nov (DPA) -- The SPD's "Kiel declaration," which opens the party's election campaign for the general election proposed for 6 March 1983, was adopted unanimously today by the party council. Following this, former Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stressed at the party's federal conference in Kiel that the declaration is intended as a signal to members and voters that the Social Democrats are determined and capable of making the present Federal Government a transitional government between one Social Democrat-led government and another.

The "Kiel declaration" places the fight against unemployment at the center of the SPD's activity. It also stresses the need to strike a balance between economic and environmental protection interests and supports the Federal Republic's demand that "the great powers reach nuclear disarmament by way of negotiations."

TALKS HELD WITH PORTUGUESE DEFENSE MINISTER

At the meeting with Woerner, the central topics were, according to a Defense Ministry spokesman, security and military policy in view of the forthcoming NATO conference in Brussels. The FRG has been giving defense aid to Portugal for a long time.

DIE ZEIT REPORTS ON GDR ECONOMIC ESPIONAGE

DW190837 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 19 Nov 82 pp 17, 18

[Article by Wolfgang Hoffman: "The Red Thieves of Ideas"]

[Excerpt] When Markus Wolf, chief of the espionage department in East Berlin's Ministry of State Security (MFS), draws a balance at the end of the year, he can again be satisfied with himself. With the relatively low input of DM5 million, his department cleared the equivalent of at least DM300 million for the GDR state budget in the form of know-how from the hostile West and from the Federal Republic.

The prospect of such a favorable ration of input to gains allows espionage chief Wolf to get over some hard losses he has suffered lately -- for example, 41-year-old scientist Rudol Fahrig, former staff member of the Freiburg Central Laboratory for Mutagenic Research of the German Research Association. The genetics scientist was just recently sentenced to 8 months probation by the Stuttgart Land Court. He was charged with acting as an intelligence agent.

Article 99 of the penal code provides for the punishment of "anyone who engages in intelligence activities against the FRG on behalf of the intelligence service of a foreign power or one of its agents to engage in such activities."

According to the verdict handed down by the Stuttgart Land Court -- a verdict which is not yet in force -- Fahrig reportedly supplied his brother-in-law, who lives in the GDR and works as an agent of the State Security Service, with papers on genetics and cancer research which in themselves contained rather harmless data.

However, it makes no difference whether actual secrets are involv d or simply material which can also be looked up in a professional journal; whether or not the activity is undertaken on behalf of a foreign power is the decisive factor.

The credit for exposing Fahrig's intelligence activities goes to one of Marcus [as published] Wolf's top agents -- of all people, to Werner Stiller, who was an agent handler and who escaped to the Federal Republic in early 1979 and brought along plenty of GDR intelligence material, including some that led to the exposure of 30 suspected agents who were primarily assigned to the fields of economy, science and technology.

Among the exposed agents was graduate engineer Arnold, a leading IBM employee in Stuttgart. For a decade he had supplied the GDR State Security Service with IBM documents to which he had access because of his position in the company. Arnold's regular dispatches of know-how saved the GDR valuable time and a lot of money in the development of a data processing system of its own. According to information available to the Ministry of the Interior, the GDR used Arnold's information "to modernize the data processing of the National People's Army [NVA] and to adapt it to Western standards."

Agent handler Stiller also was the one who provided the West German intelligence service with its first rather detailed picture of GDR economic espionage, which in the past few years has shifted its emphasis to the fields of electronics, electronic date processing, nuclear physics, weaponry, and chemistry as well as the aviation and space industries.

Stiller also provided information on how much the GDR is willing to spend on its economic espionage and what it profits from it. Marcus Wolf has an annual budget of about DM5 million to be used in the collection of Western know-how. This sum sounds modest when it is related to the number of agents who must be paid with it. It is the general view of intelligence service experts that the GDR has about 2,000-2,500 agents in the Federal Republic, and about one-third of them are exclusively assigned to the gathering of technological intelligence. DM5 million is not a very generous sum to use for roughly 800 specialists. The average espionage fee per agent comes to no more than DM500 a month.

The head of the main department for "intelligence" in East Berlin's MfS benefits, of course, from the fact that most of his collaborators in the West are already on the payroll of other employers. In Arnold's case, IBM was paying the major portion of his income. In the case of the Sennheiser Elektronik Company, the DM75,000 Robert Skottke, head of the manufacturing laboratory, collected over 15 years of military-technical espionage appears to be rather modest when compared with his regular income. What the electronics expert reported to his employer in the GDR about the Sennheiser Company and the Bundeswehr orders placed there was probably worth much more than his monthly payment of DM400 or so.

Measured by its modest expenditures, the MfS therefore operates at a profit level about which its capitalist victims can only dream. Werner Stiller also divulged that the MfS espionage department charges a high price for the know-how which the Western agents deliver free of charge to East Berlin's doorstep. Markus Wolf bills the GDR companies which copy the stolen patents and technologies 10 percent of the sum the respective company would have to spend if it had to develop on its own what the agents have provided.

The 10 percent which Wolf collects for his shop, about DM300 million, also forms a criterion for judging the damage done to the FRG espionage victims. If the MfS correctly calculates the value of its deliveries, this amounts to approximately DM3 billion. Herbert Gassert, chairman of the board of the Brown and Bovery Corporation, recently estimated that the value of the technical information flowing eastward "is in the billions" -- billions from which other Eastern states and their intelligence services profit as well.

According to findings by the Bonn Interior Ministry, however, the GDR's espionage department is the principal organizer of activities against the FRG. The share of these activities amounts to about two-thirds of all the Eastern espionage activity in the FRG. The scope of economic and scientific espionage has considerably increased during the past few years. Today this kind of espionage amounts to just about 20 percent [of the GDR's espionage activities in the FRG] and thus has nearly reached the same dimensions traditionally held by military espionage. Stiller's statements provided a hint concerning the extent of the GDR's activities. These statements indicate that more than 50 agents delivered a total of 530 scientific-technical papers of substantial volume to the "Main Administration for Collection of Foreign Intelligence" in 1975, 1977 and 1978.

To a considerable degree, espionage is controlled through the East bloc's official and semiofficial institutions in the West, such as embassies, consular departments and trade missions. In addition, the so-called mixed companies are particularly suited for economic espionage. These are FRG companies in which German partners and Eastern state trade enterprises hold shares.

The mixed trade companies are particularly suited for certain activities which, according to the latest findings of the Cologne Office for the Protection of the Constitution, are increasingly on the rise. This office has detected "increased efforts by enemy intelligence services to circumvent embargo rules."

Ever since the Western countries became more restrictive in their transfers of technology to the East, it has been increasingly difficult for the East bloc states to legally buy the technology they require. For this reason, illegal means are increasingly being used to sidestep the embargo regulations issued by COCOM [Coordinating Committee for Export to Communist Areas] over its 30-year history. This coordinating committee for East-West trade policy is made up of representatives from the NATO countries and Japan who meet at regular intervals and agree on the goods that may be of military significance to the East bloc and thus may not be delivered to them.

The methods used are simple. The German trade partner is deceived about the actual recipient of an order by, for example, listing a neutral country as the destination. Also, companies already active in East-West trade are induced to circumvent export regulations through lucrative offers.

The USSR has developed the broadest activities in this sector of intelligence work. In any event, this is what the Interior Ministry in Bonn has determined. The CSSR is second only to the USSR in intelligence activities in this area. The latest report of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution says in part: "The department for science-technology in the Czechoslovak intelligence service cooperates closely with the CSSR Ministry of Technological and Investment Promotion. On 1 April 1980, a new Ministry of Electrotechnical Industry was set up in the CSSR, obviously for the purpose of eliminating backlogs in this sector. Correspondingly, since mid-1980, the efforts of CSSR Embassy staff members to procure embargoed goods has intensified -- for instance, microprocessors and other electronic components or the relevant production documents. This is generally done through unorthodox cash transactions."

LATE REPORT: KOHL ON USSR, EAST EUROPE POLICY

[Text] Bonn, 19 Nov (DPA) -- A week after the change of leadership in Moscow and immediately following his visit to the United States, Chancellor Helmut Kohl has stressed the Federal Government's desire for good-neighborliness with the countries of East Europe. At a reception for the diplomatic corps in Bonn today, Kohl said: "We want to further develop relations with the Soviet Union to our mutual advantage." He had told Soviet talks partners, whom he had met in Bonn since his election as chancellor, "that in cooperation with the Soviet Union and with the governments in East Europe we want to remain predictable and dependable." This will continue to be the determining factor in the Federal Government's relations with the new Soviet leadership.

Commenting on his recent consultations with the Western allies in Washington, London, Paris and Rome, Kohl said that the talks had been intended as a contribution to the preservation of peace, the containment of the harmful effects of a worldwide economic crisis, and to help make European and Atlantic cooperation useful for the friends of the Federal Republic throughout the world.

Dealing with intra-German relations, the chancellor said that it is in the interests of Germans in both West and East Germany for the political leaderships in Bonn and East Berlin to be aware of the special responsibility of both German states in the heart of Europe for the consolidation of peace. He noted that Federal President Karl Carstens and GDR Council of Senate Chairman Erich Honecker had reaffirmed this at Leonid Brezhnev's funeral in Moscow, and had stated the intention of the two states to continue and further develop their relations on the basis of the basic treaty.

Kohl emphasized to ambassadors accredited to Bonn that his government is convinced of the usefulness of an East-West relations dialogue. In this connection, he pointed to the CSCE negotiations in Madrid, and expressed the hope for developments in Poland which would encourage dialogue dialogue and national consensus and lead to the release of the detainees and the lifting of martial law. He also stressed that the Federal Government had high expectations concerning the current disarmament talks and hoped above all for specific progress in the Geneva negotiations.

In his speech, Kohl emphasized that because of its special position, the Federal Republic is interested in stable international relations. "Tensions act more quickly and more deeply to our disadvantage than is the cause with others. In our position, misunderstandings and unpredictability would be dangerous." Therefore, the Federal Republic's policy is aimed at "clarity, firmness and dependability."

In his speech, Kohl touched on all regions of the world and spoke in favor of a partnership which paid attention to and showed concern for the political interests of others. The Federal Republic's economic means are limited, but at the same time Bonn does not want to shirk the tasks outside Europe which it had taken on together with other European states. Although the Federal Republic could not meet all wishes, it would try "to maintain the high level of development aid and expand it where possible." Respect for the independence of partners remains the paramount basic principle.

On the Middle East problem, Kohl said that it can only be solved if "the right to exist and the right to security of all states in the region, including Israel, are implemented, as well as the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination."

ETENDARD AIRCRAFT, EXOCETS SHIPPED TO ARGENTINA

[Text] Paris, Nov 18 (AFP) -- Five French-built Super Etendard aircraft together with Exocet missiles left Saint Nazaire port, west France today for Argentina aboard the Argentine navy cargo ship Bahia San Blas.

The Exocet air-sea missile was used successfully by the Argentinians against the British task force during the Falklands conflict earlier this year.

The Saint Nazaire harbour master said the vessel was carrying 200 tons of arms and ammunition, 72 tons destined for Buenos Aires and the remainder for Puerto Belgrano.

Port sources said the loading had taken place discreetly since Monday. The five Super Etendard were flown to the nearby Gron-Montoir airfield and only had to cross a road at the end of the airfield's runway to reach the quayside.

The Bahia San Blas had previously made a stop in Flushing, New York State, where it loaded 200 tons of material, the sources added.

SOCIALIST PARTY'S JOXE VIEWS POST-BREZHNEV USSR

PM190809 Paris LE MONDE in French 13 Nov 82 p 8

[Interview with PS National Assembly Group Chairman Pierre Joxe by Jean-Yves Lhoumeau -- date and place not given]

[Excerpt] [Joxe] We Socialists are unable to have the same kind of relations with the Soviet Union as were possible in De Gaulle's days. The invasion of Afghanistan, the pressure exerted on Poland, and the USSR's positions on the followup to the Helsinki conference are an obstacle to the improvement of relations which can neither be normal nor very good. But I am sure that partially open approaches are possible and that some constant factors will not be changed by the death of one man.

[Question] Why partially open approaches and which ones?

[Answer] The problems which will arise within the leadership team concerning the redistribution of responsibilities will probably bring the resolution of internal problems to the forefront for a while. The occupation of Afghanistan is costing the USSR a great deal and its pressure on Poland is causing it increasing political and economic problems. A political change at the top will lead to such questions as how to seek political rather than military solutions in Afghanistan and the attitude toward the central European countries.

Time Standing Still

Without calling its alliances into question, Hungary has some degree of autonomy even in its method of political functioning. The situation in Czechoslovakia is at present that of a dominated country. But there is no reason why it might not eventually undergo a development comparable to that of Hungary. In Poland, the national situation could find its own way. All those developments may be resumed at a time when political conditions are being symbolically changed in the Soviet Union by the death of the leader.

[Question] Men come and go but how can their ideas evolve when they have been cast in the mold of the one party?

[Answer] The talks which we recently had in the Soviet Union gave us the opportunity to hear old speeches on security, disarmament and France's place in the Atlantic alliance, repeated in an astonishing way by people with whom some of us had already met years before. We had the impression that time had stood still. A change of leadership could suggest that people younger than the average Soviet leadership may have a say.

[Question] What difference do the leaders' ages make?

[Answer] I have observed that in the Soviet Union the understanding of the outside world and the USSR's history differs according to the generation. Think of the people who were young, as I was when I went to the USSR for the first time. At the time there was a slogan which was as follows: "Catching Up and Overtaking the United States As Regards Living Standards Within 15 Years." The people who heard that slogan when they were young and who, 30 years later, observe that it is no longer even put forward are bound to question their own history -- their own history, as they have experienced it, not the history recounted to them. They would tend to judge the Soviet Union's postwar history rather than to indefinitely prolong the October Revolution dream.

[Question] Is that true of the PCF leaders who are paying tribute to Leonid Brezhnev for his action in the sphere of democratic progress, for the "understanding" and solidarity which he showed toward "peoples struggling for national, social and human liberation?"

[Answer] I suppose that the PCF leaders are making such statements because they have arguments to put forward. I think that the PCF abandoned the effort to make a detailed analysis of the reality of state power and the social system in the Soviet Union a long time ago. The Central Committee communique strikes me as being the conventional expression of fraternal feelings which the French Communists may have toward the Soviet Communists, but it could not claim to be a description of the Soviet Union's economic and social development.

If there is a development in the Soviet Union in a direction which favors independence or simply national existence in central Europe, the French Communists will have to revise their analysis of the past. But that is obviously more important for the Czechoslovak or Polish Communists. There are currents in all the central European countries which do not express their views. Not all the Czechoslovak Socialists or Social Democrats have emigrated. Not all the Polish Socialists or Social Democrats have emigrated.

MITTERRAND TO VISIT INDIA 27-30 NOVEMBER

LD191030 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 19 Nov 82

[Text] It is official: Francois Mitterrand will visit India between 27-30 November. This was announced by the Elysee Palace. The head of state will carry out this trip following his 24-26 November stay in Egypt.

Mitterrand Interview

AB181752 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1030 GMT 18 Nov 82

[French President Francois Mitterrand's interview with the Indian magazine INDIA TODAY on 16 November -- place not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] You are visiting India exactly one year after Mrs Gandhi's visit to France. During that period, officials of both countries have spoken of trying to make the Franco-Indian political and economic agreements "models of North-South cooperation."

In the economic sphere, intergovernmental cooperation has increased in a spectacular manner: Mirage fighter planes, digital technology for telephones, an aluminum factory and oil prospecting; however, trade between the two countries is still low. Do you think that we now have a model which other advanced and developing countries can try?

[Answer] Franco-Indian relations are ancient, which is natural for two countries which have inherited such rich civilizations and which are spurred on by an equal desire for independence, freedom and progress. Over the past few years these relations have been remarkably boosted, especially since Mrs Gandhi's visit to France a year ago. This is the result of the common desire expressed at the highest level by the leaders of the two countries.

I attach particular importance to the essential role of nonalignment, of which your country is one of the promoters and which Mrs Ghandhi stands for today. I still believe that India, a developing country in certain respects, is endowed with a very developed culture, technology, agriculture and industry. We have a lot to discuss and a lot has already been discussed. We also have a lot to do together and we are prepared.

The Franco-Indian dialogue has been intensified in all spheres: economic, scientific, technical and cultural exchanges have followed from this. Is it a model of cooperation" [words indistinct] between the two partners, on the recognition of interdependence and solidarity, on the efforts of one to surmount the problems of development and the other to master the scientific and technological revolution. Our message is that of two big countries which want to contribute through their common action to the search for a more just and more stable international economic order. For this message to have an impact it must be based on noteworthy achievements in spheres such as agriculture, industry, high level techniques and culture. This is what we are seeking in our bilateral relations and also individually in the spheres which belong to us. In this respect, I praise the role played by India under the guidance of Mrs Gandhi in South-South cooperation during the New Delhi talks attended by 44 developing countries in February 1982.

[Question] A year ago your government made provisions for generous support to the Third World. In the post-Cancun phase, North-South negotiations timidly advanced during the past year. Although France seems more committed than the United States to the participation of international financial institutions, the Americans seem to prefer private enterprise and multinationals which sponsor development programs. What can be done to again inject urgency into this debate? There is a school of thought according to which France's ardor for the Third World is progressively declining....

[Answer] I am surprised at your question. France's desire to pursue an active policy in favor of a new international economic order has not weakened. How could it be otherwise when France's own interests demand it?

The international economic and monetary disorder is a threat to peace because it undermines the stability of all countries and even more so that of developing countries which are subject to dependency on imported food and are hit by the cost of energy supplies and the instability of the prices of raw materials. One must help the Third World as a matter of justice and well-understood interest.

What is France doing today? France promised to increase public aid for development by .7 percent of its gross national product in 1988, which represents the doubling in real terms of the volume of aid in 7 years (.15 percent of the gross national product in 1985 for the less advanced countries).

[Question] Mr President, France's foreign policy has often been referred to as a "combination of idealism and realism." Is there any attempt by the French Government to play the role of a mediator in conflicts before they become confrontations between East and West, thus offering a "third way" among the superpowers?

[Answer] France's foreign policy is founded on the historic role of a country which occupies an important place among nations by virtue of its geography, its vital interests and the great ideas it has launched during these last 2 centuries, which have resounded all over the world.

Without action, words are nothing. Faithful to its tradition, France has taken clear positions on Afghanistan, the military imbalances in Europe and the Geneva negotiations between the Americans and the Soviets. Peace depends on balance and this can only be achieved through discussion and the rejection of the arms race and intimidation by all sides.

As a member of the same defense alliance as the United States, we maintain solidarity with this country with which we have a long traditional friendship. But within the alliance, France has conserved its sovereignty and its decision making autonomy not only in the miltiary sphere but also in the political field. This permits me -- if necessary -- to express to our American ally our refusal to accept some of their positions. The examples of Central America or the Soviet gas pipeline are known by all.

For France, it is not a matter of "nonalignment" or of a "third way" among the superpowers. It is a matter of saying what we feel is worth saying; it is a matter of making the voice of France heard in an atmosphere of total independence.

That is why France and India are joined in a difficult international context. Your country, like ours, wants to make its voice heard and through their actions, they both contribute [words indistinct]. How can it be otherwise since it requires the sustained willingness of its leaders who are always anxious to gain respect for the sovereignty and the national identity of their country to stand against expanding the confrontation of blocs, to denounce interference and to strengthen confidence and peace among states.

France appreciates this willingness, which explains the richness of the dialogue between our two countries and underlines the interest in the visit I am happy that I will soon undertake at the invitation of the Indian authorities.

[Question] You once wrote that politics was not your first priority; that it was the servant of science and the humble interpreter of philosophy; and that it did not possess the creative virtue of the arts. In your post as one of the world's most powerful presidents, do you have enough time to mediate and reflect?

[Answer] Except during my trips, I reserve all my evenings for reading, meditating and conversing about subjects other than politics. For 25 years now, I have avoided all social activities. Finally, I have preserved my health.

[Question] In "La Paille et le Grain," Mr President, you wrote that you neither believed in destiny nor in unavoidable disasters. Some people would like to describe as "predestined" some problems facing us today. Have you always been moved by this strong sense of reality?

[Answer] I believe in the will of man and in the determining role of the individual.... If he knows how to direct his actions toward the movement of history and if he learns to distinguish the structures of the society. This must be learned.

[Question] What memories do you have of your previous visits to India? Is there a particular place in this vast country which particularly appeals to you and where you would like to visit?

[Answer] I only know Bengal and its contrasts. This visit will enable me to satisfy some of my curiosities. But knowing India means living with it. Will time afford me this opportunity? In any case, understanding the Indians better will be an excellent introduction for me.

LIONEL JOSPIN CITED ON FRENCH-SPANISH RELATIONS

[French PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin interview granted to EFE on 15 November in Paris]

[Excerpt] Paris -- French PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin told EFE yesterday that in his opinion, there is no dispute between France and Spain regarding the problems of expanding the EC and the antiterrorist struggle.

"I do not believe that we are opposed as far as these problems are concerned," the French Socialist leader said in a lengthy interview granted to the Spanish national press agency regarding Spanish-French relations now that there are Socialists in government in both Paris and Madrid.

Jospin dismissed the French-Spanish disputes in both these controversial fields as "differences of assessment" and pointed out that respective stances were "clearly asserted on both sides" during President Francois Mitterrand's visit to the Spanish capital.

"Therefore, the conditions now exist for serious negotiations to proceed," was the conclusion on this point by the French PS leader, who is very close to the president of the republic.

The first Socialist leader to grant an interview to the Spanish press following the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's triumph stressed the Spanish and French peoples' desire that these relations be "good."

Discussing the change in French policy vis-a-vis Spain since the Socialists' accession to power on 10 May 1981, he described it as "a change of attitude, at least."

On the French side there is a desire to "speak clearly, not to conceal the real nature of the problems to be resolved, not to say one thing in Madrid and another in southwest France."

Jospin, one of the three politicians to meet weekly with Mitterrand at key working luncheons, gave assurances that once "mutual respect" has thus been established, "real progress will be possible."

A career diplomat and still active as a university teacher, the PS first secretary wants the French and Spanish to "abandon their mutual prejudices regarding Spain and France respectively."

To this end, he envisages an intensification of cultural relations and a large number of visits between the countries aimed at improving mutual acquaintance.

MARCHAIS DISCUSSES AFGHANISTAN, WALESA RELEASE

NC181550 Paris AFP in English 1533 GMT 18 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 18 (AFP) -- The problem of Afghanistan might be resolved "fairly quickly French Communist Party Secretary-General Georges Marchais said here today.

Mr Marchais -- discussing at a press conference talks he had in Moscow with Yuriy Andropov, the new general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party -- said progress had been made concerning Afghanistan.

The Soviets, Pakistani President General Mohammad Ziaul Haq and Afghan President Babrak Karmal all wanted a "political solution" in Afghanistan, said Mr Marchais, who was in Moscow Monday for the funeral of Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev.

Mr Marchais also said that the release from internment of Polish labor leader Lech Walesa was "an important factor in international detente", even if major reforms remained to be carried out in Poland.

MARCHAIS, PCP'S CUNHAL HOLD PRESS CONFERENCE

LD181406 Paris Domestic Service in French 1145 GMT 18 Nov 82

[Text] Alvaro Cunhal, general secretary of the PCP, is in Paris, where he had a meeting with George Marchais at the PCF headquarters. The two general secretaries held a joint press conference shortly before noon today. Here are the main points of it: the strengthening of cooperation in the struggle for peace and disarmament; and both parties' opposition to Portugal's entry into the Common Market. Georges Marchais said that he is optimistic as regards possibilities of detente after his visit to Moscow. We noticed also in Georges Marchais' statement his impression brought back from Moscow that there is the possibility of a political settlement of the Afghan problem. As far as French affairs are concerned, Georges Marchais spoke about the coming municipal elections and voiced his astonishment at the Socialist Party's decision on St Etienne where it intends to present its own list. Mr Marchais, as you will probably hear this evening issued a warning to the Socialists.

FANFANI CONTINUES CONSULTATIONS WITH PARTIES

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 19 -- The Italian Government crisis, sparked by the resignation last week of Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini's five-party coalition, appears to be moving along towards a solution.

Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani wound up his first round of contacts with the political parties and seems ready to draft a government platform in the coming week.

Fanfani, Senate speaker and a veteran Christian Democrat politician, announced the timetable of his next meetings in a press conference Thursday. He said we will have another meeting Saturday morning with the parties "which encouraged me to pursue" the effort to form a new government.

Fanfani said that these same parties would be partners in his government. They are the same parties in the outgoing cabinet -- the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals — and a few of the smaller groupings represented in Parliament.

Reports that overtures had been made to the Communist Party were denied by the PCI leadership. In a statement, the party said the "climate is confused and ambiguous" and there "is the risk that everything will come down to a clash on the duration of the government and a fight over the date of early elections".

The Communists voiced their opposition to a revival of the five-party formula and challenged the new government "to act" to induce management to change its "intransigent" position on contract renewal and labor costs negotiations, "the main cause of the current social conflict".

Of the partners in the outgoing minority, the Liberals, Social Democrats and Fanfani's own Christian Democrats seem to be the most willing to join a new coalition. The Republicans, whose secretary is outgoing Prime Minister Spadolini, have set as a condition for the participation, that Fanfani's platform respect the previous governments economic program.

But the major hurdle is the attitude of the Socialist Party, which wants a government with a short-life, essentially a caretaker government until early elections are held.

But Christian Democrat Party Secretary Ciriaco de Mita made it clear to Fanfani Thursday that the party rules out the creation of a government "whose demise is established from the beginning". This same position was voiced by the secretaries of the Social Democrat and Liberal Parties.

FRG'S KOHL HOLDS TALKS WITH POPE JOHN PAUL

[Text] (ANSA) — Vatican City, November 18 -- World peace, the situation in Poland and the defense of human rights were the key themes discussed here today in a private audience the pope granted to West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

A spokesman for the chancellor, Junger Sudhoff, said that Pope John Paul II had asked for a briefing on the recent talks that Kohl had in Washington with U.S. President Ronald Reagan with regard to human rights and ways to consolidate world peace. The chancellor also exchanged views with the pontiff concerning the disarmament conference in Geneva and the pope reported on his own recent trip to Spain, the spokesman said.

Kohl's visit to the Vatican lasted an hour-an-a-half.

The last visit made to a pope by a Christian Democratic West German chancellor who was also a Catholic was when Kurt Georg Kiesinger was received here by Paul VI. Kohl arrived in Rome for a one-day official visit to Italy this morning.

Kohl Optimistic on Relations

[Text] [Name indistinct] reports on the Rome visit of FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl, who left for Bonn this evening:

The long private conversation with John Paul II in the Vatican, which centered on the themes of peace, human rights and Poland -- especially in the light of the post-Brezhnev period -- represented the most significant part of Kohl's lightning visit to Rome. The present government crisis has certainly influenced the chancellor's talks with Pertini, outgoing Ministers Spadolini and Colombo and top Christian Democratic leader De Mita and Piccolo, as Kohl is also the president of the German Christian Democracy, and his talks with the prime minister designate, Fanfani. Nevertheless, some important points emerged: First, the excellent Italian-German relations; second, the contribution of the two countries to the lessening of international tension on the basis of better East-West relations -- which will require a different attitude by the new Soviet leaders toward disarmament and detente; and third the commitment of Bonn and Rome to Europe. In this respect Kohl said: [Begin recording in German fading into Italian translation] "Beginning on 1 January next year, the Federal German Republic will assume the presidency of the [European] Community. During this period, we shall strive to relaunch the process of European integration which Rome and Bonn hope for and to which they have already made a valid contribution with proposals to expand cooperation within the Community as contained in the Colombo-Genscher European (?plan)." L'UNITA EXAMINES BREZHNEV'S FOREIGN POLICY

[Lapo Sestan article: "The USSR and the World Since 1964"]

[Text] A judgment on Soviet foreign policy in the Brezhnev years is complex, especially because the results are contradictory.

On the one hand, the view that these years, especially from 1965 to 1976, are to be regarded as a period of considerable successes, can indeed be shared in many respects. The USSR has succeed in achieving the realization of its greatest postwar aspiration: to achieve strategic parity with the United States and become a global power recognized as such. Moreover, the USSR's control over Eastern Europe has found legitimization at the international level, first with the FRG's Ostpolitik and the Helsinki Conference in 1975, without the need explicitly arising to attenuate or review the principles of th so-called "Brezhnev doctrine."

This has meant an undoubted increase in the USSR" influence on the international scene, accompanied by an ability to translate its own recently acquired power and the recognition of it into a new kind of relations with the West -- the policy of detente. This policy, although not ruling out the aspect of rivalry, nevertheless found its new and characteristic element in the idea of the constant search for an agreement in the common interest. In this respect, the process of detente was perceived by the Soviet side as a historic turning point which guaranteed economic benefits and, especially, an expansion of its own influence and global presence without the danger of a direct confrontation with the United States and its allies.

On the other hand, it is impossible not to point out the fact that, under Brezhnev, Soviet foreign policy has also had to register grave failures, especially since the mid-seventies, and that, overall, the internal and international trends on which its successes were based appear weakened.

Confrontation with the United States has become more active and extended, with possible implications even with respect to what the USSR used to perceive and still perceives as established facts at the military and strategic level. Moreover, the recognition of the USSR as a global power has been accompanied by an increasing weakening of its system as a political and social model. In this respect, the growth of the Soviet presence in some areas of the Third World, especially in Africa, has been unable to counterbalance grave failures and setbacks, especially in the Middle East, where it has lost its influence in Egypt.

In the second half of the seventies, the very difficulty encountered in resolving the disputes with China acquired disturbing features in the Soviet view, once again presenting the threat of a potential alliance between that country and the West, and at the same time an element of profound contradictoriness with respect to the USSR's aspiration to play a role as a global power -- the continued existence of a security problem along its borders.

This contradictoriness, which we could sum up in terms of the USSR's appearance as a country characterized more than ever by the paradox of simultaneously displaying acute indications of weakness and strength at the time when its power was most highly developed, was manifested most forcefully precisely within the context of its most direct system of interdependence -- Eastern Europe. In this regard, the events in Poland constitute the major challenge and the indicator of a broader process from several viewpoints. Indeed, Soviet control over the area was still strong, but as the years went by its capacity to exercise it shrank in the direction of increasing recourse to the argument of the security of the socialist experience and of the potential use of force. To the already burdensome list of disputes with the West, this not only added new elements of tension and objectively increased the problems in the way of their attenuation, but also once again posed a problem that to some extent existed throughout the Brezhnev years and constituted the central point of a reflection on Soviet foreign policy for close to 20 years: the tools proposed by the USSR for exercizing a global role on the international scene and the extent to which they were or were not equal to the problems posed on that scene. From this viewpoint, the very issue of an overall assessment of Soviet foreign policy, of its successes and failures, can be based on certain points.

Compared with Khrushchev, the new Soviet leadership characterized itself by its conviction that to maintain the global contest of dialogue with the West, and particularly the United States, it was necessary to provide the country with, among other things, a greater military strength than had been the case. In this regard, Khrushchev's policy was considered too optimistic, too confident in the Soviet economy's competitiveness, and in any case, unsuited to surviving possible hard times. The Cuba crisis, though never recalled in public, must certainly have exerted substantial influence. However, this was still accompanied by a capacity for political initiative that enabled the USSR to increase its prestige and influence. Its conduct during the Vietnam war was an example in this connection: The idea of a dialogue with the United States was never allowed to drop, and indeed the SALT agreements were signed while fighting was still in progress.

However, what was lacking even then, both before the start of the detente process and especially later, in the early seventies, was the realization of the implications deriving from the shift of the contest to the field of dialogue. This implied above all the need to reappraise the role being regained in this shift by capacities on the internal plane, with regard to both economic development and the organization of its own system of interdependence.

In this regard, the abandonment of the reform plans in the mid-seventies and the 1968 intervention in Czechoslovakia were two indications of this lacking of awareness. Basically, the USSR was approaching the field of the contest-cum-dialogue with serious unresolved problems at home and therefore with inadequate means at its disposal. The contradiction that Khrushchev's successors stressed as the major weak point in his approach to foreign policy reemerged, though reversed; now it was the weight of its military might -- albeit not accompanied by internal solidity -- that proved unequal to the tasks. And as before, this discrepancy was the source of tensions and attempts to find dangerous shortcuts.

L'UNITA HOPES USSR WILL TAKE INNOVATIVE STEPS

[Guiseppe Boffa commentary: "Hope of Innovation"]

[Text] Yuriy Andropov's election to the top Soviet political post, that of CPSU general secretary, came as no surprise. Back in May, when Andropov joined the party Secretariat, our newspaper was able to point out how such a shift indicated that the Soviet leadership nucleus, or at least a substantial and authortative majority within it, was even then clearly oriented toward that succession for Brezhnev.

This also explains the rapidity with which his rise was decided on and announced. It is likely that even the 24-hour delay in the announcement of Brezhnev's death -- a delay revealed by Soviet sources themselves -- was due to a concern to reach the final agreements in those 24 hours.

We recognize in this a habitual secrecy of political life that is certainly not in line with our own view and concept of public affairs. But within this questionable framework, we also see the anxiety not to give the world the impression of power and responsibility vacuums at the head of a country that has so much power; as the Americans say, there was a desire to make it known right away that there was somebody in charge, that is, in the place where the top decisions are taken.

The question now being asked by all commentators in all newspapers is whether Andropov's election is a prelude to a period of innovations or to one of mere continuity. In fact, lasting innovations almost never depend on a single man, though Soviet history itself suggests to us that individuals, the leaders' personalities, count for a great deal. Usually at time of transition such as this, the new leaders' first concern is to stress continuity; this is what was done in the first appeals and speeches following Brezhnev's death. But this does not mean that innovations will not subsequently emerge. Neither is there anything in Andropov's complex personality, with the diverse political experiences behind him, that rules out an ability to proceed toward reforms and innovations. Indeed, more attentive observers throughout the world indicate precisely such a willingness on his part. To such indications we add our sincere hope.

The need for innovatory measures stems from the facts, we believe. It is all the more easy for us to say so inasmuch as we have stressed this need for some time. Everyone is aware that the USSR is experiencing difficulties in which many serious problems have accumulated. Domestic problems mainly concern the economy, with its falling degree of efficiency and the pronounced slowing of development; the crucial aspect is food, since not even the huge imports can ensure sufficient supplies to the population. At this point economic difficulties create political and social problems too.

In our opinion, the international problems are not new either, since we have already discussed them so much.

This includes those internal to the Soviet alignment itself, in which new and more equal-based relations have long been needed, as demonstrated all too well by the situations in Afghanistan and Poland; and those in the broader world context, in which a real new trust to detente can no longer be imparted by repeating old formulas, but itself demands a great capacity for formulating new ideas and original initiatives.

We have frequently stated our view regarding the approaches that we consider desirable. However, these approaches are not our own invention. They emerged from the 20th CPSU Congress over a quarter of a century ago and the pressing needed for them has never been disproven by the successive historical experience of the USSR and the countries of its alignment. They concern the requirements of democracy, whose development we have always hoped for -- and still hope for -- as an indispensable part of socialism; only a real involvement of the citizens' and workers masses in the direction of public affairs can stimulate the energies that could resolve so many serious problems.

Even Andropov's election does not itself resolve the problems of "succession." Despite all the differences, the situation in many respects presents some analogies with China's situation in 1976. In that year, China saw the demise not only of Mao and Zhou Enlai, but also of several other top leaders. This was decided by inexorable bilogical laws. A similar problem now exists in the USSR. It could be said that the task facing Andropov, who is after all 68, is therefore to promptly open the way to grant access to power by a new and younger group of leaders; this is what others have had to do in China over the past 5 years.

We can only hope that the new Soviet leaders will successfully resolve these problems. We say so with all the more sincerity inasmuch as the USSR is too important a factor in today's world for the solutions that will emerge from it not to be important to all of us, from one end of the planet to the other.

L'UNITA CRITICAL OF SPADOLINI, U.S. TALKS

[PCI Central Committee member Romano Ledda commentary: "A U.S. Visit: Many Words; Many Contradictions"]

[Excerpts] It is traditional for our prime ministers to visit Washington to gain encouragement and support for the government coalitions that they lead. It is part of a ritual, so to speak, of a world still conceived as split into blocs, and therefore we will not be unduly scandalized by it. Similarly, the bombast that usually accompanies the "great event" is part of the same ritual. However, this time official optimism was unable to express itself as usual. Indeed, not even the most well-disposed commentator was able to judge Spadolini's U.S. visit a success. "A useful visit, despite everything," is the most positive headline that we managed to find in the Italian papers, while our search in foreign papers proved fruitless. The visit was virtually ignored. And certainly the pomposity of Spadolini's comments on his meetings with Reagan and the top representatives of the present U.S. Administration served little purpose. On the contrary, the verbal excesses and the prodigality of smiles on all occasions resulted in several rhetorical statements (who remembers the Versailles summit any more, Senator Spadolini?) and a few inevitable "lies" about the gas pipeline, which further damaged the image of Italian foreign policy by presenting us once again with a scenario not unusual within the five-party coalition but extraordinary in an international mission; the foreign minister contradicting his prime minister.

Trusting in his skills as a mediator, Senator Spadolini arrived in Washington with a twofold ambition; to patch up the rather tattered fabric of European-U.S. relations and to carve out within them some space for Italy in connection with Nuove Pignone's rotors.

And this is precisely what he did, despite his subsquent embarrassed denials. His only strong suit, at least in his opinion, was the unflattering U.S. assessment of Italy as its most loyal ally in a Europe that has now become rather unreliable. Well, the facts -- the ineluctable reality of deeds which is always more important than words -- immediately destroyed Spadolini's "portrayal."

First, nobody in Europe asked our prime minister to mediate in anything. Indeed, as things stand, the European governments believe that it is the United States that has entered a dangerous tunnel and that it is therefore up to the United States to extricate itself from it by backtracking. Second, the United States would be willing to let Nuove Pignone have its rotors, but only if Italy assumes -- as Spadolini already began to do in the United States -- the role of gaining acceptance from its European partners of the new code of "global and coordinated" strategy against the Eastern bloc desired by the U.S. Administration, which interprets it in terms of a trade war. (May we be permitted a digression on this point; today sees the reopening in Madrid of the preceedings of the CSCE, which are proving turbulent and difficult. Will Italy argue there -- in the name of cooperation -- that it is necessary to pursue a strategy of economic pressures on the Eastern bloc?) Third, the "most loyal ally" was all promises and smiles, but as for how and when the New York customs barriers will be raised, we are not saying that excuses were offered, but it seems that no specific commitment was made.

As on the domestic plane, so too on the international plane, the time for verbal mediations, postponements and the patching up of increasingly glaring fissures is rapidly running out. And instead of attempting a vacuous mediation, Italy should have made its voice heard in Washington on the monetary, commercial and industrial storms that are exacerbating the world economic crisis and stated its conviction of the need for a return to the difficult path of detente and international cooperation. So much for satisfaction -- as emerged from the astounding interview granted to Radio Newsreel 1 last Sunday -- because they praised us for sending troops to Sinai and Lebanon.

But there was one question above all that should have been put to the Americans -- a very simple and very pertinent one, since many aspects concerning the Italian and European economy depend on it. Washington should have been asked: Whom do you intend to make pay for the crisis, with your dollar worth almost 1,500 lire? And what about all its consequences and interconnections in the world markets, in production development, inflation rates and so forth?

POPE'S ASSAILANT IDENTIFIES ASSOCIATE TO POLICE

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 18 -- Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turkish terrorist convicted of trying to assassinate Pope John Paul on May 13, (?1981) has revealed the name of at least one accomplice who was with him in St Peter's Square at the time of the shooting, according to the Rome's DAILY AMERICAN, English-language newspaper. The paper claimed that an authoritative source close to the investigation had said that Agca has now supplied Italian authorities with the name of a man who was in the square and armed at the time of the attack.

The man is believed to be either Omar (?Bagci), extradited recently to Italy from Switzerland, or Musar Cedar Celebi, who is currently being held by West German police in Frankfurt, the daily said. Both, like Agca, are Turks with extreme rightist backgrounds. Investigators believe they supplied Agca with money, false documents, and weapons, but had not linked them with the attack itself. The DAILY AMERICAN said that after Agca's latest revelation, investigators are actively working on the assumption that more than one person was in the square.

These talks will be resumed when the vice governor of the Bank of Portugal travels to Mozambique. His trip is expected to take place at the end of this month.

Mozambique's planned purchases from Portugal are aimed at ensuring complete logistical support for about 10,000 of its military personnel over the next 5 years.

CDS SAYS DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE MUST LOOK TO FUTURE

PM181531 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Nov 82 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Social Democratic Center Party National Council Says: Democratic Alliance Must Soon Examine Its Future"]

[Excerpt] "It is essential that at the beginning of next year the parties of the Democratic Alliance, both individually and collectively, carry out a thorough deliberation about the Democratic Alliance's future." This is stated in the final communique issued at the end of yesterday's meeting of the Social Democratic Center Party's [CDS] National Council in Lisbon. During the proceedings, criticism was also made of the "damaging, albeit isolated, rumors" sometimes heard "concerning the Democratic Alliance's destruction" in favor of the so-called "Central bloc."

The communique begins by stressing the significance of the revision of the Constitution and of the approval of the laws on the constitutional court and national defense, and continues as follows:

"Now that the phase of the democratic reform of the state and the full institutionalization of pluralist democracy is successfully concluded, there now begins... a second phase of decisive political action, which the Democratic Alliance must carry out and complete in 1983 and 1984 -- the period of thorough economic and social reforms in the direction of the country's modernizaton, economic development, prosperity and social justice, which have become essential priorities both in relation to the need to resolve the economic and financial crisis that has long assailed the country and the state and in relation to the basic challenge of progress with which our imminent integration into Europe will present us."

Having criticized the president of the republic's recent television appearance, the CDS asserts its commitment to the Democratic Alliance and states that the deliberation now proposed for the start of next year is "indispensable for the clear development of Portuguese political life, for the faithful, active and dynamic implementation of the Democratic Alliance program and for the sure, effective and successful promotion of the structural reforms promised the country in 1980."

UCD EXECUTIVE RESIGNS TO CLEAR WAY FOR CONGRESS

[Unattributed report: "UCD: Entire Executive Resigns"]

[Excerpts] Madrid — The Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] Executive Committee has decided to call a special congress 11-12 December to set the party on its way to a solution. In the course of the Executive Committee meeting, which was held yesterday morning, all its members resigned from their posts. An organizing committee comprised of Inigo Cavero, Juan Antonio Ortega, Rafael Arias Salgado, Antonio Jimenez Blanco and Gabriel Cisneros has been appointed to replace the Executive Committee and take charge of convening, organizing and coordinating work concerning the special congress.

The congress proposed by [UCD Chairman] Landelino Lavilla will discuss reports on ideology, organization and rules and will elect the leadership bodies. The party Secretariat disappears until the holding of the special congress, except for the Secretaryship for Economic Affairs.

Press Conference

"I have experienced no pressure to call the special congress," Lavilla said at a press conference in the afternoon, stating that this decision is due to "the need to rebuild the electoral option of the UCD as an alternative to the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE]."

Lavilla stated that the congress will be attended by some 500 delegates and gave information about the committee chosen to organize that congress, on whose members we have reported above.

Lavilla stated that before making the decision there was a personal analysis in which there was an assessment of aspects of the election results, which he described as an "alignment of voters in two political forces, without laying the foundations for a two-party system, owing to the difference between the PSOE and the Popular Alliance." He expressed the UCD's intention to cooperate in rebalancing the political system and the UCD's need to spell out and specify its ideology, although not revise it. In this connection, he referred to an idea of the UCD as being close to the Greek New Democracy Party or the European People's Party. He stated that he is prepared to run for the party chairmanship again at the congress.

Lavilla said that he will not be on the caretaker committee: "I did not wish to take part since I intend to put forward my candidacy as party chairman." He was asked whether he had maintained contacts with Garrigues or Suarez, and replied that he had with Garrigues but not with Suarez. Asked about the distance between the UCD and the People's Democratic Party [PDP], Lavilla replied that "the distances are those marked out by Al Alzaga and the PDP in having placed themselves where they are."

The former centrist chairman stated that consequences of the party's clarification -- people may go over to other political parties -- may still remain, and that he has never been opposed to coalitions.

In his turn, Antonio Garrigues declared that the UCD "should base its conduct on a sound ideology." Concerning a possible centrist rapprochement with the Democratic Liberal Party, Garrigues stated that "everything depends on what the UCD decides at that congress."

PCE'S SARTORIUS ON USSR'S POST-BREZHNEV COURSE

PM181357 Madrid ABC in Spanish 14 Nov 82 p 34

[Article by PCE Executive Committee member Nicolas Sartorius: "Light and Shade"]

[Text] The death of Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev is undoubtedly, as well as a human tragedy, like any death, a political event of indisputable importance which poses a number of enigmas concerning the future, albeit within certain limits, because there is no doubt that the death of a leader who controlled the fortunes of a big power for 18 years, personally combining the CPSU general secretaryship and the post of head of state in an authoritarian regime, cannot fail to represent in itself a change the significance of which would be hazardous to pinpoint at this moment. However, the Brezhnev era has ended, and an assessment can be made of it from three different but interrelated viewpoints which are worth distinguishing. In the first place comes the level of international policy. My opinion is that the Soviet leader conducted himself as he actually was: the head of state of a big power who sets that power's interests above everything within the dynamics of the policy of blocs. The record of these years, despite reprehensible decisions, such as those which caused the invasion of Czechoslovakia in the summer of 1968 or the invasion of Afghanistan 11 years later, is positive as a whole for the general interests of peace and detente. The Helsinki Conference, the SALT I and II agreements, East-West maintenance [as published] (despite the aggressiveness of Reagan's foreign policy), the initiatives toward the EEC countries, the caution in the Middle East conflicts and his constant preaching in favor of peace, disarmament and detente bear witness to this. It would be neither objective nor fair to doubt the USSR leadership team's desire for peace throughout this period, and it is natural that this should be so, since it is a vital need for the development of the nation as a whole.

However, it is no less true that this desire for detente and peace always exists within the bounds which a logic of blocs imposes on those who willingly accept it. For that very reason, I believe that significant changes will occur in this field. But what I do venture to assert is that the coordinates within which the big powers' foreign policy operates do not allow many innovations without endangering the precarious existing balance. The changes will come, as is already happening at present, from the wishes of the peoples — through votes, where they are allowed, or weapons, where they are prevented -- who are carrying out political and social changes or transformations despite this logic of the blocs.

My opinion is a good deal less favorable from the viewpoint of domestic policy. Neither in the field of the resolution of the problems of production and consumption, and much less in that of the recognition of respect for individual or collective freedoms, can the record be deemed satisfactory. There is no doubt that Soviet society has advanced over the last 20 years in science and technology, public facilities, education, health, sport and so forth, but perhaps not with the expected vigor and with the creation of grave shortfalls in supplies caused by the well-known bottlenecks in agriculture and in the industrial sectors which produce consumer goods.

This gives the impression that a rigid and ossified political system and a gray and bureaucratic general atmosphere have been, and are, weighing like a leaden slab on the development of the Soviet citizens' productive and cultural energies. This would suggest a classic contradiction in Marxism between the standard achieved by a people's science and technology, education and economic development and the legal, political and institutional forms straitjacketing social life; in a word, between the conquest of space and universal secondary education on the one hand, and the psychiatric hospitals and lack of freedoms of expression on the other. How long these contradictions can continue without provoking internal upheavals is difficult to predict. Whether or not there are forces within the party itself capable of resolving this tension positively is an enigma, although it is not to be ruled out. At any event, this is precisely where changes would be most necessary, although one cannot be very optimistic in the short term, bearing in mind the power structure prevailing in the USSR. In any event, Brezhnev curbed and stabilized the process of liberalization [apertura] which began at the 20th Congress under the guidance of his predecessor, Nikita Khrushchev.

Third and finally, we could not assert that following these last 18 years the ideas of communism are experiencing their best moment of prestige, despite the fact that mankind's extremely grave problems require, today more than ever, a radical change in the economic and social order in the direction of socialism. The truth is that the countries of so-called real socialism, with their light and shade, are no example as a whole to the workers, forces of progress and intellectuals of West Europe, hence the efforts to find new paths on our continent through Eurocommunism and in the Third World by means of other, less peaceful, paths. It does not seem plausible that the USSR's new leaders will change their stance on these new but disturbing phenomena and on not accepting the implacable logic of the blocs; at any event, time will tell if this is so.

CURIEL ASKS PCE DESERTERS TO RECONSIDER DEBATE

[Unattributed report: "Curiel Appeals To 'Deserting' Intellectuals"]

[Excerpt] Madrid -- PCE Secretariat member Enrique Curiel has appealed to the group of Communist artists and intellectuals who have announced their relinquishment of membership unless the leadership reconsiders its refusal to hold an extraordinary congress: "It is bad news," Curiel told EUROPA PRESS. "I am asking them to reconsider their decision.

"This is a time," Curiel said, "when nobody must leave the party. It is a time when we must make a collective effort of recovery." With regard to the request for an extraordinary congress, the communist leader said: "I believe that what the party needs at present is a political debate, without historionics (in the sense of our confronting the party with the dilemma of an insoluble confrontation.) I believe that it is a mistake to polarize the party between advocates and opponents of an extraordinary congress. Because in any case," Curiel added, "this extraordinary congress, if prepared hastily and hurriedly instead of being an instrument of political intergration, could be an instrument of dispersion and ideological confrontation. This congress, which will be politically important, demands preparation and planning and must take place once the party's new secretary general has become established."

"We are faced with the dilemma," Enrique Curiel said, "of either restoring the PCE or of the PCE splitting. I am convinced that in this task of restoring the PCE -- which depends on a political and organizational recovery, a recovery of influence within the workers' movement, among the forces of culture, intellectuals and young people and within the universities and on a strengthening of the party's representation within society -- we are all needed, whatever our opinions and whatever stance we hold within the party."

The communist leader continued as follows in his remarks to EUROPA PRESS: "This task of restoration is probably a long-term one, which will not be completed in 3 months, 6 months or even a year, and this demands calmness and at the same time the courage and political will to perfcrm this task, which will be difficult. In this connection, I profoundly lament the decision by some comrade artists and professionals, but I express my confidence and my desire, as just another Secretariat member, that they will reconsider this decision, that we will discuss all that there is to be discussed and that we will all make an effort to seek collective soutions, because there is no individual solution." I am convinced," Enrique Curiel concluded, "that there is no narrow-minded, stubborn attitude on the PCE leadership's part. There is an attitude of calm, political and thorough debate and flexibility. I appeal to these people to consider this decision, not to leave the party and to express their opinion quite freely with the party so that we can seek a collective solution satisfactory to all."

The party national conference, the option decided on by the Central Committee for examining the present crisis, is granted broad powers by party regulations, with the following two exceptions: the modification of the PCE program and the election of leadership bodies. Apart from this, the conference is fully empowered to discuss aspects concerning party policy, to introduce changes into political tactics and into its position. Curiel provided the following explanation: "It is a framework within which a thorough political debate can be carried out, which is what I believe must now be done."

Leadership Wants Contacts

PM181543 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 17 Nov 82 p 14

[F.M. report: "PCE Secretariat Advocates Rapprochement With Group of Dissident Intellectuals"]

[Text] Madrid -- The PCE Central Committee Secretariat, presided over the first time by its new secretary general, Gerardo Iglesias, announced yesterday at the end of a 4-hour meeting that it will have a number of contacts and personal meetings with members of the group of artists and intellectuals linked with the party, who announced last Thursday their intention of leaving the party unless an extraordinary congress is held.

According to Andreu Claret, apart from a meeting with this group where such contacts could be made, the Secretariat extended an invitation to the group as a whole to attend and to discuss its positions at the national conference scheduled for 17-19 December. Such contracts will be made by party cultural chief Eulalia Vintro and Gerardo Iglesias himself. According to party rules, there can be no change of PCE rules, program or leadership at a National Conference. Andres Linares, one of the 30 or so artists and intellectuals who disagree with the PCE line, believes that the holding of such a meeting should be an inadequate and unsatisfactory measure, stressing that he believes it essential to hold an extraordinary congress. In this connection, he cited the example of the convening of a congress by the Union of the Democratic Center -- "a party which, faced with a similar situation, did not resort to half-measures."

Clemente Aparicio, another member of the group, seemed more optimistic and in favor of trying to achieve an elucidation and a compromise by the party leadership on the future policy line to be pursued by means of the above mentioned meetings and the National Conference.

The guidelines of the National Conference, where a political report will be presented by the secretary general, will be the debate and analysis of the country's and party's situation as well as the formulation of a strategy to be pursued in the subsequent elections for the municipalities and autonomous communities. According to Claret, the Secretariat will propose to the Executive Committee the establishment of a rule for the conference that will ensure the utmost participation and degree of democracy. The PCE Secretariat wants the conference to serve as a preparation for the next regular congress, which could be set for a date after the above mentioned elections, with a view to continuing "in an orderly and calm manner the debate begun at the last Central Committee meeting."

Next Monday's Executive Committee meeting will include, among other things, an examination of what stance the PCE will adopt at Felipe Gonzalez' investiture, the convening of the National Conference, the drafting of a document on the elections for the municipalities and autonomous communities and the election of a committee responsible for organizing the party campaign.

Apart from giving the constructive approach priority over criticisms of the party, the Secretariat pointed to the duty of supporting the workers commissions in the trade union elections. Andreau Claret gave a positive assessment of the meetings that the PCE held throughout the country last weekend to explain the decisions taken at the last Central Committee meeting at which Santiago Carrillo was replaced as secretary general by Gerardo Iglesias, and explained that there was an atmosphere of expectation within the party regarding future changes.

PAPER COMMENTS ON U.S. LIFTING OF SANCTIONS

[Editorial: "Worse for USSR"]

[Text] In a doubly pragmatic reconsideration of previous decisions, President Reagan has lifted the technological embargo imposed on the USSR for the supply of turbines intended for the Urengoy gas pipeline. Pragmatic toward the USSR, the U.S. President thus makes his contribution to the period of grace due to every new government setting out. Pragmatic with its allies, Washington attunes its approach to their interests. The underlying aim which prompted the embargo, is perhaps better served by an agreed policy, an Altantic blueprint, nor economic relations with the Soviet Union.

The European Allies' acceptance of the conditions set out by Reagan is more important for the West than their acquiescence in the terms of the embargo. The Western unity which has been achieved for the strategy of alternative energy sources, the supervision of technological supplies to the USSR and the shared decisionmaking on everything concerning the flow of capital toward the Eastern bloc, as a whole, comprise a basis for unitary effectiveness which makes meaningless the latest claims about NATO's alleged crisis.

The Western dispute over the Siberian gas pipeline, which has now been resolved, over the last few months, marked the highest level of dissension achieved by the USSR between the United States and its allies.

However, the current solution constitutes the best opportunity known in the postwar period for the West to influence, the gravest internal contradiction confronting the Soviet Union: That between the demands of civil society and the peacetime economy, and the demands of the military economy and technostructure.

Maybe the USSR's arms effort will no longer enjoy the external support of the civil economy which was sustaining it. To be as indebted to the resources of one's opponent as one's opponent is himself was certainly a more than tasteless joke, but it was a miracle of detente.

POLITICAL LEADERS COMMENT ON BREZHNEV REIGN

[Unattributed report: "Danish Obituaries Contained Both Praise and Criticism"]

[Text] In response to the death of President Leonid Brezhnev, Her Majesty Queen Margrethe II sent the following telegram to the Supreme Soviet Presidium: "Deeply moved by the death of Supreme Soviet Presidium Chairman Leonid Brezhnev, I ask the Presidium to accept my sincere condolences."

Prime Minister Poul Schlueter expressed deep sympathy on his own behalf and that of the Danish Government. The prime minister added, "With the death of Leonid Brezhnev, one of the Soviet Union's great statesman has left international politics. In the West, Brezhnev will be remembered for the opening the Soviet Union made at the beginning of the seventies. Brezhnev made a great contribution to the promotion of the policy of cooperation and negotiation necessary for detente between East and West. Brezhnev's term in office was characterized by an indisputable desire to avoid confrontations in world politics which could lead to a catastrophe. However, at the same time he reserved the right to pursue the Soviet Union's special political interests throughout the world as defined by the Soviet Union itself. Unfortunately, the last few years of President Brezhnev's career were characterized by problems for detente, but it is the Danish Government's earnest hope that the president's successor will be able to overcome the obstacles to the continuation of the policy of detente."

Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen said in a statement that Brezhnev was actively involved in the normalization of Soviet relations with the FRG, the CSCE conference and the SALT agreements.

Former Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said that despite everything, the Brezhnev era saw progress in thawing relations between the Eastern and Western worlds. Anker Jorgensen added that "there were many of us hoping a year ago that something positive would come from Brezhnev's so-called offer to guarantee the Nordic area as a nuclear-free zone. The offer, however, was not followed by any concrete action." "There can be no doubt that Brezhnev's death is a major loss to the Soviet people. We must all hope that he does not leave behind him a vacuum which will further slow down or make more difficult the many efforts being made for peace and detente in the world."

Danish Communist Party Secretary Ib Norlund said that Brezhnev saw his career as the implementation of what he himself called the Leninist course. He made major efforts to develop a democratic life, both in the party leadership and in society.

Erik Otterstroom of the Communist Workers' Party's Executive said that on Brezhnev's death, congratulations are in order for people throughout the world, especially those in Afghanistan, Eritrea, Kampuchea, Poland and Czechoslovakia and the Soviet people. "He was the personification of the Soviet domestic and foreign policies, which have meant military pressure and attacks on third countries, rearmament madness and the incarceration of dissidents."

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE ON LIFTING PIPELINE EMBARGO

[Editorial: "From the Top, Slowly"]

[Text] Relations between the United States and Europe are now back where they were after the Versailles summit in June, when agreement was reached in principle between the United States, Japan and the EEC on the main outlines for economic policy toward the Soviet Union -- and we are back at this point again. There is so little and so much in the agreement proclaimed by President Reagan last weekend as a background to the decision to end sanctions against the European-Soviet natural gas pipeline.

Calling this an "agreement" is using big words. The European partners are content to see it as an "understanding" on the principles for East-West trade, for which the practical framework will now be the object of further negotiations in the hope that an agreement can be reached before the next summit next summer. However, President Reagan needed a few grand words to package his suspension of the sanctions, and we should not begrudge him this. He has after all been generous enough to overcome his own misgivings. This has taken 5 months, to be sure, and they have been an extraordinarily difficult time for Western cooperation. Now everything is righted again, or is at least as right as it was before.

There was agreement in Versailles that the West's trade with the East should neither give military or strategic reinforcement to the Soviet Union because of the products involved, nor support the Soviet economy through the way in which it is financed. The representatives of the circle of nations involved in the summit will decide in the next 6 months how to define in practice the advanced technology which should not be exported to the Soviet Union and classify the strategic products on the prohibited list. At the same time, attempts will be made to arrange continuous coordination of the exporting nations' credit policies. Finally, a joint assessment of West European gas supplies will be undertaken so that alternatives can be tested before new contracts are signed with the Soviet Union. The restraint in this Western program speaks for itself, since there is in the present economic climate, or in the Eastern bloc nations' credit-worthiness, no great reason for involvement in further risky export arrangements.

However, the practical shape to be given to the principles agreed upon could nevertheless easily lead to difficulties. The French reaction to President Reagan's announcement is already an indication of this, even though the French statement could be a sign of an internal lack of communications within the French Government. The important thing is that the fundamental disagreement between the United States and Europe caused by the sanctions has been removed.

SWEDEN

POLITICAL LEADERS COMMENT ON BREZHNEV DEATH

PM181621 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 12 Nov 82 p 16

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA - DAGENS NYHETER report: "Swedish Reaction to Brezhnev's Death: Man of Detente"]

[Excerpt] Thursday [11 November] -- Leonid Brezhnev's efforts for detente in the world shine through Swedish reaction to his death. Olof Palme: "Leonid Brezhnev had a genuine interest in international detente and peaceful coexistence. He was seen as a moderating force by many circles. At my meetings and talks with him over the years, I had the impression of a man with a personal involvement in disarmament endeavors," Palme said.

"His death could of course create many questions about developments in the Soviet Union and in international politics. We know from experiences that there is always a period of uncertainty when a superpower changes its leadership. I hope that this process will not lead to increased polarization in world politics, but that people will now follow the road of moderation and cooperation."

Liberation Party leader and former Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten also stressed Brezhnev's efforts of behalf of peace, but he also offered some criticism: "It was during Brezhnev's time as party chief that the world witnessed the events in Prague, Afghanistan and Poland and increased internal repression of the Soviet Union's own citizens. There is no reason to believe that his successor will pursue a policy that will signify any radical change.

[Center Party leader and former Prime Minister] Falldin criticized Brezhnev for "the violation of Afghanistan," but was more positive about developments in Swedish-Soviet relations: "Swedish-Soviet relations in the areas of industry, trade, and culture have developed favorably during this time and have been broadened and deepened to our mutual advantage."

Moderate Coalition Party leader Ulf Adelsohn expressed concern over what Brezhnev's death could mean for Swedish security policy: "Leonid Brezhnev's death makes the political situation in the world around Sweden even more uncertain. Our foreign and security policies must new bear the stamp of caution and balance. No one today knows what repercussions a change of leadership in the Soviet Union will have for Soviet domestic and foreign policy."

Left Party-Communists leader Lars Werner said that Brezhnev's personal efforts to bring about the Helsinki conference on peace and detente were recognized in "wide political circles." "The Soviet Union's new leadership is entering office in a situation in which detente has been replaced by exacerbated international antagonisms and intensified rearmament. Constructive endeavors to promote detente and disarmament and prevent a nuclear war are needed more than ever before. It is our hope that this will leave its mark on future Soviet policy."

BODSTROM ON SHIPPING MILITARY SUPPLIES TO NORWAY

LD182158 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 18 Nov 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom said at the Riksdag question time today that it is not contrary to Sweden's neutrality to permit the transport of military equipment to Norway, (?in a reply) to Oswald Soderqvist from the Communist Left party. Bodstrom said that every country must be allowed to decide itself how it wants to organize its defense and from where it wants to buy military equipment.

U.S. SHIFT ON SANCTIONS 'NOT MUCH OF A CARROT'

[Editorial: "The Tango Beau"]

[Text] President Reagan probably does not know Master Olof [historical play by Strindberg dealing with the life of Olaus Petri, responsible for the reformation in Sweden], but the two men have one thing in common: It wasn't victory they were after, but the struggle. After all the words of warning delivered by both advisers and allies, it should have been clear to the U.S. President last December that punitive measures were not the right way to make Moscow have second thoughts about Poland.

It was after the introduction of martial law in Poland that the United States unilaterally, and without any consultations with its allies, pushed through a policy of sanctions to halt the giant project for the construction of a gas pipeline from Siberia. This pipeline is to provide Western Europe with energy.

After billion-dollar losses for U.S. industry, lost job opportunities and problematical new splits in the Western alliance, Reagan has now laid his big stick to one side. However, he has equipped himself with a new cane, which is intended to be more subtle.

It has been clear for a long time that the sanctions, which never became popular among the U.S. allies in Europe, were being run down. The Europeans simply refused to take any further part in them. The U.S. President admitted this himself when he said a few days ago that "it takes two to tango." It is uncertain whether in his future maneuverings vis-a-vis the Soviet Union will have such pliable partners as he is trying to make out.

During the discussions surrounding the gas pipeline that have recently begun within the Western alliance, it has been established that economic ties with the Soviet Union that are too intimate or too generous could damage the West's own interests as far as the military and security policy situation are concerned. This is nothing new. The Allies have been agreed on this for a long time, even though the Europeans have frequently allowed themselves a freedom of interpretation that has been disliked in Washington. The fact that the Western alliance has now agreed on a "new" trade strategy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union is now being portrayed by Reagan as a "victory."

This is alarming. The Germans, Britons and Japanese, by politely saying that they welcome the new course, have welcomed Reagan to save face. It is only the French who have once again demonstratively asserted their independence and sovereignty by noting that Paris has nothing to do with this agreement.

According to Reagan's presentation of the new policy toward the Soviet Union, no new contracts for the supply of Soviet gas will be made, controls on the export of strategic products will be tightened and credit policy will be harmonized. Through this presentation the U.S. President gives the impression that this is an agreement reached by the Western alliance. However, it is more like disucssion points agreed on in the talks that have been held. There are not written agreements, nor has there been any detailed investigation of what the Europeans may or may not do in their business with the communist superpower. The stage has been well set for new disagreements on interpretation, and both the French and British have made it clear that there cannot be any European concessions.

The fact that Reagan's decision was announced 3 days after the death of Leonid Brezhnev and at the same time as hints of better times in Poland is more of a coincidence. However, it is not without its point. Moscow understands well that even the superpowers' figureheads sometimes need to save face. Nor is there any need to be especially sensitive about the motives behind this. At a time when new possibilities of dialogue are being opened up, there is an opportunity to devote more attention to the carrot than the stick, even if not much of a carrot is being offered.

SPECULATIONS ABOUT ANDROPOV, HIS POLICY

[Editorial: "Coronation in the Kremlin"]

[Text] More swiftly than what the world is accustomed to, the top political set in Moscow has agreed on who is to lead the Communist Party after Leonid Brezhnev. In doing so it has demonstrated an important decisiveness but has perhaps also shown that the power changeover in the Kremlin had long been prepared and all that was necessary was to follow the detailed plans.

The fact that 65-year-old Yuriy Andropov had been chosen as the party's general secretary and now fills the most important post in the Soviet system comes as no surprise. Among the new names mentioned in connection with a power changeover in the Kremlin, Andropov was considered to be the strongest candidate with the best qualifications.

It is unclear what kind of man Yuriy Andropov is. Should he be judged primarily on his work during the 14 years when he was the Soviet Union's policeman number one or for his work as an ideologist and diplomat? From 1977 to the end of May this year, he was chief of the Soviet secret police and security service. It was during this time that the KBG took ruthless action against any expression of opinion which questioned the party line. During Andropov's period as head of the KBG, the Soviet Union's dissident group were crushed. As former chief of the secret police, Andropov not only had a trump card over his rivals in the form of the information at his disposal, but the KBB also is a gigantic machine and its chief ought to know better than anyone else the domestic and economic situation, which can be of the greatest importance when it comes to making decisions about the country's stability in the wider context.

There is also another picture of Yuriy Andropov: The intellectual party man with a broad international outlook and the persuasion that significant reforms of a stiff-legged system are needed if the Soviet Union is to be able to develop in the way its natural resources allow. Immediately after his elevation, Yuriy Andropov stressed the importance of collective work. It remains to be seen who else will occupy the top posts in this collective and how long they will be able to pull together.

The seemingly rapid changeover at the top of the Soviet hierarchy gives the rest of the world some hope that there will not be any sudden, adventurist changes in Soviet foreign policy. Even though people are now expecting the smooth continuation of what has hitherto been Soviet policy, this does not have to mean that there will not be room for reforms under the new leadership.

In the Eastern European countries living under the Soviet yoke, in particular, new hopes are probably now stirring of a softer attitude in Moscow than the one demonstrated by Brezhnev. Yuriy Andropov has considerable knowledge of conditions in Eastern Europe. In his meetings with Eastern European leaders, he has shown greater understanding than other Soviet leaders for the notion that some reforms are necessary. And as far as the Poles are concerned, there should be some justification for their hopes that Andropov will realize better than others in the Kremlin that the militarization of power cannot continue.

But no one yet knows what the rest of the Soviet leadership will have to say.

U.S. TOUGHNESS TOWARD USSR WILL NOT HELP CLIMATE

[Olof Santesson editorial: "The West and the New Man in the Kremlin]

[Text] The power handover in the Kremlin opens up new possibilities for relaxing world tension. This is according to some observers in the West who would like to see some first step from U.S. President Ronald Reagan in particular. Reagan has now lifted the sanctions against West European firms supplying equipment for the Soviet natural gas pipeline. The West Europeans have long been hoping for this decision, but are now being forced to cooperate in other ways in what is nevertheless a restrictive approach to business with the Eastern bloc. The Western agreement had been prepared even before the news of Brezhnev's death arrived, but it will be more interesting because of the power handover in Moscow. The new man in the Kremlin, Yuriy Andropov, has immediately been described by a surprisingly large number of sources as a man with an international approach and a potential for developments in a "liberal" direction.

Deaths invite cosmetic statements. Many of the reactions to Brezhnev's death belonged to that genre. Unfortunately, Prime Minister Olof Palme's and Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom's statements were among the softer. It would have been possible for them to be a little tougher. The question is whether contention gains the upper hand over the facts or whether Sweden's foreign policy makers lean toward the idea that nice words can create openings in Moscow.

No one can accuse Ronald Reagan of an open-armed welcome. However, once the U.S. President got the letter of condolence out of the way, he reverted to his usual tough talk at his press conference the other day. It is true that this time he did not say that the Soviet Union "lies," but he did say that that country has been talking detente for the last 10 years without showing any desire for detente in its actions. The United States wants to seek peace, but "peace is a function of strength." He had really taken the "first step" by lifting the grain embargo, but "it takes two to tango." Reagan did not see Brezhnev's death as an opportunity to seek the preservation of detente. He rejected the idea that he should travel to Brezhnev's funeral himself, despite the fact that members of his own administration had recommended such a goodwill gesture.

The question is what positive results are phrases and gestures likely to achieve. Informed observers generally stress how stupid it is to believe that the rest of the world is able to conjure up reasonable policies in Moscow. It is probably wrong to believe that the leadership in the Kremlin contains moderate groups who want to save cooperation with the West above all. Many lines cross one another. There is probably an important division between those who chiefly see their rival as naive and easily tricked and those who fear in him a dangerous and evil-minded enemy. (In principle there is probably a similar division among White House advisers.) Swift U.S. initiatives with political substance would put Moscow's back against the wall before Andropov is sitting anywhere near securely in the driver's seat. Nuclear arms negotiations and other loaded East-West problems hardly brook any long delays. However, it will take time before any definite conclusions can be drawn about the new man in the Kremlin. Soft talk from Reagan would be confusing news and would hardly do any good, perhaps it could even do damage. One thing is certain, a continued tough approach by the United States will not improve the climate following Yuriy Andropov's accession to power.

FRENCH MISSILES TO ARGENTINA INFURIATE THATCHER

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Excerpts] A showdown between Britain and France now seems inevitable following the disclosure that France is again supplying Exocet missiles to Argentina. The prime minister is reported to be furious that a fellow member of the Common Market should be providing weapons to a country which, in strict legal terms, has not ended the conflict with Britain over the Falklands.

A huge row will erupt in the Commons over the disclosure that an Argentine vessel, the Bahai San Blas, was seen leaving St Nazaire, on the west coast of France, with a cargo of five Super Etendard aircraft fully equipped with Exocet misiles of the type which sank two British ships, HMS Sheffield, and the Atlantic Conveyor, during the Falklands war. Mrs Thatcher will face a barrage of questions in the House of Commons over what some MPs regards as "something akin to treachery "by the French.

The Foreign Office has already expressed its own "disappointment" at the news. The word "disappointment", when used by the Foreign Office, is a euphemism for what it regards as a serious breach of relations between two close countries. The Foreign Office has tried, however, to explain it away by saying: "These are part of the balance of existing contracts already licenced. We are most disappointed they have resumed delivery, particularly in the absence of a definitive cessation of hostilities on the part of Argentina. As we have always said, it is for each country to decide its foreign policy on arms sales." Nevertheless, the Foreign Office and the government are clearly amazed that the French are still supplying Exocets to Argentina.

Mr Eric Heffer, oppositionfront bench spokesman on European affairs, said angrily tonight: "I absolutely deplore the fact that any democratic government, especially a socialist one, is selling weapons that could be used against our soldiers. Argentina is still fully in the hands of a military junta. These weapons could be used against our forces and I find it absolutely outrageous."

The Foreign Office declined to add to its earlier statement that Britain was "naturally disappointed" that Exocet deliveries had been resumed. A spokesman said: "We have made our views very clear to the French and will continue to do so." He added that Britain had been in touch with several countries which had been suppliers of arms to Argentina, but declined to offer any comment on demands by MP's that Britain should cut back on its own arms sales throughout the world.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym is due to meet his French opposite number at a European Council meeting in Brussels on Monday.

Later, Mrs Thatcher said of the French resumption: "Well, you know, they held them up during the actual Falklands war and although they were under contract to deliver them, President Mitterrand said 'No, you have invaded the Falklands. This is against international law'." Mr Mitterrand had ordered that experts then should be held up. Mrs Thatcher added: "We were very grateful to him for that. Obviously, we would prefer that people do not deliver arms because the Argentinians have not said that there is a permanent end to these hostilities."

ARAB LEAGUE, MINUS PLO, PLANS TO VISIT IN DEC

[Excerpts] An Arab league delegation hopes to visit Britain early next month to discuss prospects for a Middle East settlement, the Foreign Office said today. The delegation, to be led by King Hassan of Morocco, will include foreign ministers from Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria. The visit has been postponed on at least two previous occasions. It follows an Arab summit at Fes more that two months ago when it was agreed that a delegation would visit the capitals of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council. The delegation has already been to Washington. Mrs. Thatcher and Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym are certain to receive the delegation coming here.

It now seems clear that Britain has been firmly resisting requests for a member of the Palestine Liberation Organisation to joint the delegation. British policy on dealing with the PLO were well-known. The PLO could be received at official level but not a ministerial level. The spokesman acknowledged that a member of the PLO was included in an Arab delegation which saw Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd earlier this year.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS CONTINUE IN NICOSIA 18 NOV

[Text] A new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon.

Before the meeting, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, stated that constitutional issues will be discussed again. In answer to journalists' questions, Mr Gobbi stated that during the last two meetings, important issues were discussed such as amendments to the Constitution and others. Now the intention is to discuss certain issues which were not completed during the first round of the talks, mainly the points of the evaluation document which allow for further negotiations to reduce the differences. Mr Gobbi expressed the hope that discussion of the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue will begin very soon. Mr Gobbi further said that around 10 December he will go to New York, and from there to his country for Christmas. The talks, therefore, will be recessed and will be resumed in early January.

Mr Mavrommatis, the Greek Cypriot representative at the talks, said that effective next week the interlocutors will deal with Cyprus' territorial aspect. Mr Onan, the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, also made the same statement, and added that the Turkish Cypriots' security is a matter that concerns his community very much.

GOBBI CLARIFIES REMARKS; GOVERNMENT REPLIES

[Text] Before the intercommunal session today, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, made the following statement:

In my television interview to the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation the day before yesterday, I expressed certain views which, in light of the comments that were made, need some clarification on my part. I particularly wish to refer to a true situation which I mentioned in my interview. I mentioned that the United Nations Forces in Cyprus [UNFICYP] cannot replace troops without the consent of the interested parties. At this point, I indicated the reasons cited by the Turkish Cypriots -- not my personal views -- against the replacement of the Turkish troops by UNFICYP. I expressed my convictions when I said that I am in favor of the withdrawal of foreign troops and the presence of the United Nations. Therefore, Mr Gobbi concluded, my statement should not have left margins for misinterpretations.

The government spokesman stated that the clarification by the UN secretary general's representative today regarding his interview with the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation is welcomed.

BULGARIAN DELEGATION MEETS KIPRIANOU, ENDS VISIT

NC181955 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 18 Nov 82

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou today received Kubadinski, chairman of the Bulgarian Fatherland Front National Council and member of the Bulgarian People's National Assembly, and (Fakaliev), the official responsible for the front's foreign affairs, who were accompanied by Bulgarian Ambassador to Cyprus Bochev and senior cadres of the Democratic Party. During the meeting, Kubadinski conveyed a personal greeting from Bulgarian President Zhivkov to Kiprianou and stressed that the Cyprus issue concerns not only Cyprus but all of humanity. For this reason, he said, Bulgaria will continue to give its support to the just struggle of the Cypriot people.

In reply, after referring to the friendly relations between Cyprus and Bulgaria, President Kprianou stressed that from his visit to Sofia he had ascertained President Zhivkov's lively interest in the Cyprus issue. He also reiterated his invitation to the Bulgarian president to visit Cyprus because, he added, such a visit will strengthen cooperation between the two countries even more.

After briefing the Bulgarian dignitaries on the Cyprus issue's current developments, President Kiprianou thanked the Bulgarian people and Zhivkov personally for the support they give to the struggle Cyprus is waging.

AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou also had a meeting with the delegation of the Bulgarian Fatherland Front National Council. Papaioannou briefed the delegation on the Cypriot people's objectives that Turkish and all other troops leave Cyprus; that the British bases be abolished; and that Cyprus be demilitarized. Papaioannou also stressed the need to implement the UN resolution on Cyprus and thanked Bulgaria for its sincere support for the struggling Cypriot people. The delegation's head, Kubadinski, mentioned that Bulgaria will always be by our people's side. The Bulgarian delegation, which visited Cyprus at the invitation of the Democratic Party, departed for Sofia.

A joint statement by the two sides mentions that a protocol was signed between the Democratic Party and the national front for further cooperation.

Joint Statement on Visit

[Text] A delegation of the Fatherland Front National Council of the Bulgarian People's Republic headed by Mr Pencho Kubadinski, chairman of the National Council, paid an official visit to the Republic of Cyprus from 16 to 18 November 1982 at the invitation of the Democratic Party [DIKO] of Cyprus. The delegation was received by Mr SpirosKiprianou, president of the Republic of Cyprus and DIKO chairman.

The Bulgarian delegation has held talks with DIKO officials headed by Mr Alexis Galanos, DIKO parliamentary spokesman and chairman of the party's International Relations Committee. The two sides stressed their joint conviction in safeguarding peace and security and in strengthening understanding, trust and friendship among states and people in the Balkans, Europe and throughout the world.

During the talks, Mr Pencho Kubadinski expressed the solidarity of the Bulgarian People's Republic and the Bulgarian people with the Cypriot People's struggle for a peaceful and just solution of the Cyprus problem. He reaffirmed the principled firm position of the Bulgarian People's Republic as outlined by Mr Todor Zhivkov, general secretary of the BCP Central Committee and chairman of the State Council of the Bulgarian People's Republic, during his November 1981 talks in Sofia with President of the Republic of Cyprus and DIKO Chairman Mr Spiros Kiprianou. The delegation of the Bulgarian People's Republic Fatherland Front paid tribute to the memory of Ethnarch Makrios and laid a wreath on his grave.

A protocol for further cooperation during the period 1982-1986 was signed between the Bulgarian People's Republic Fatherland Front and DIKO of Cyprus. NC190847 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 19-25 Nov 82

There are now over 70 national news agencies in nonaligned countries participating in the pool which is trying to build up an alternative concept of news based on the principles and objectives of the Non-aligned Movement.

The pool seeks to establish an integrated telecommunications network linking all its members as part of its general aim of promoting a new international information order. Pool participants are committed to strive against all forms of aggression, foreign intervention and occupation.

Further Report

NC191105 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 18 Nov 82 pp 1, 7

[Report by T. Kondoyiannidhis]

[Excerpt] The march to the U.S. Embassy, marking the Polytechnic [uprising] anniversary, took place yesterday with PASOK and KKE slogans against the Americans, NATO and the bases and with violent wrangling and squabbling among supporters of the two parties.

The march, which was very impressive from the point of view of people participating, lasted about 6 hours and included 85 persons wearing military uniforms protected by a three-deep circle of civilians around them. The strong guard around them was characteristic of the strong protective measures for those in military uniform.

Another "impressive" participation in the march were the 2,500 independent anarchists, who demonstrated with the sticks and the chains they were carrying.

The police were on full alert and had taken strong measures, they were very discreet during the march, but at the same time kept a special watch on the anarchists. It is noteworthy that a strong police force was right behind the big crowd of independent anarchists. The fear of incidents by the anarchists compelled the police to be on constant vigilance all night.

In connection with the squabbling among PASOK and the KKE supporters, the following is quite noteworthy:

1. Both sides tried to portray the most extreme slogans possible. For example; Out of NATO forever. The peoples do not need patrons; Out with the bases of death; Americans, murderers of people; Reagan, fascist murder; Out of NATO and the EEC, and so forth.

The antagonism between the PASOK and KKE, in an effort by both parties to spark retaliation by the leftwing masses participating in the march, was tarnished by their contradictory slogans and their strong controversy, such as: The struggle is now being vindicated (a PASOK sologan; The struggle is now being continued (a KKE slogan); The people do not need patrons (a PASOK slogan); Send away the patrons right now (a KKE slogan):

2. A quarrel broke out and greater incidents almost occurred when PASOK supporters, exasperated by the continuous provocations of KKE supporters, shouted at the latter: Out with the KGB, go to Jaruzelski's junta. A clash was averted thanks to the intervention of more coolheaded people.

3. Another characteristic is that the extremist slogans by PASOK supporters are in striking contrast with the policy which Mr Papandreou is following on these questions. The PASOK slogans in question are: Out of NATO; Out of the EEC; Out with the American murderers forever; The bases of death should be removed.

It should also be noted that the prime ministers wife, Mrs Margaret Papandreou, participated in the march; she headed a small team of the Union of Women of Greece, of which she is president. It is worth noting that when one of those participating in the march greeted Mrs Papandreou, she replied in English, thanking him.

4. Slogans for EAM [National Liberation Front] and ELAS [National People's Liberation Army] were also carried during the march.

Speeches at Dinner

[Report on dinner speeches by Turkish President Kenan Evren and Jordanian King Husayn in Ankara on 18 November]

[Text] President Kenan Evren has said that the current international tension and problems and conflicts in the Middle East made it most indispensable to hold contacts and consultations between Turkey and Jordan aimed at peace. Evren expressed his conviction that intensifying such contacts would contribute to the mutual benefit of the two countries and regional stability and peace. President Evren made this statement during a dinner he gave in honor of visiting King Husayn of Jordan.

In his statement, the president recalled that close and cordial relations existed between Turkey and Jordan based on historic and cultural links. Pointing out that the visit made by Emir 'Abdallah of Jordan to Turkey in 1937 would always be remembered, Evren said that the present visit by the King of Jordan is a significant example of the friendship between the two countries.

President Evren said that Jordan's great efforts in favor of peace and stability in the Middle East were well appreciated. Pointing out that instability in the region was exacerbated with the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, Evren said that the sad incidents in that country, and particularly the slaughter in the two Palestinian refugee camps, have been very painful and caused resentment in Turkey. Evren said that these developments were the latest examples of the Israeli policies of fulfilling its political ambitions through the use of force and fait accomplis in disregard of the interests of the regional countries. Evren said that these developments have proved once more the urgency of finding a just and lasting solution to the Middle East and Palestinian problems.

Evren continued: The establishment of a lasting and comprehensive peace in the region is possible through the return of the usurped rights if our Palestinian brothers, the withdrawal of Israel from the territories it occupied in 1967, the recognition of all legal rights of the Palestinian people including, that of self-determination, and the right of all the countries in the region to live in security within internationally recognized borders. We consider as necessary the PLO's participation in the Middle East peace negotiations. Our country is determined to extend its strong support to its Arab brethren as it has done in the past.

President Evren said that Turkey considered the Reagan peace plan for the Middle East and the resolutions at the Fes Arab summit as very encouraging developments. Expressing his hope that the interested parties would begin negotiations as soon as possible, Evren said that [words indistinct].

On the war between Iran and Iraq, the president said that this conflict between two brotherly countries, which has been continuing for 2 years, was very regretful and sad. Evren said that Turkey would continue to do its best to stop this war, which threatens peace and stability in the region. He added that Turkey supported all efforts for the solution and [word indistinct] of this conflict.

President Evren said that Turkey witnessed with pleasure the great developments taking place in Jordan, particularly the great strides being made in the economic field. The president said that Jordanian efforts for peace and stability at a time when conflicts in the Middle East could drag all the countries of the region to an unknown destiny were more vital than ever. Pointing out that the particular close links between the two countries made the promotion of bilateral relations very favorable, President Evren said that the development of cooperation between the two countries, the exploiting of existing potentials and the further promotion of relations with Jordan in all fields will benefit both countries and will contribute to regional peace and stability.

In his statement, King Husayn of Jordan expressed his great pleasure over his visit to Turkey and extended the greetings of friendship and brotherhood of the Jordanian people. He added that he hoped efforts to promote relations between the two countries would be successful. Accusing Zionist aggression of causing tension in the Middle East, invading Arab territories, slaughtering the Palestinian people and occupying sacred places, the king of Jordan said that the Israeli atrocities were carried out before the very eyes of the world despite the UN General Assembly and Security Council resolutions. The king said that the plan prepared at the Fes Arab summit constituted an important step for providing peace and stability in the Middle East. Recalling that the Palestinian problem was the core of the Middle East issue, the king said that [words indistinct].

Husayn congratulated President Evren for winning the confidence of his people to become the president of his country and for the approval of the new Turkish Constitutin. King Husayn concluded by saying that Turkey's development and happiness is our only wish. As an expression of his cordial feelings, the king extended an official invitation to President Evren to visit Jordan.

Prior to the dinner given in his honor, the king of Jordan was received by President Evren at the Cankaya presidential mansion. Evren and Husayn held talks for some time. Ahmad (al-Laksi) in charge of the royal palace was also present at the talks.

Pasin expected Turkey's deficit in the balance of payments to continue in 1983 but grow smaller, adding the aim should be to attain an economic structure that will not need foreign aid by 1984.

Pasin is leaving Friday for next week's GATT session, where he will brief the 88 members attending on Turkey's disputes with EEC over her cotton yarn and T-shirt exports, and expects to hold "bilateral talks" in connection with Turkey's economic relations before the meeting. ENERGY MINISTER ILKEL REVIEWS PLANS, FUTURE

[Text] The budgets of the Ministries of Energy and Natural Resources and Youth and Sports were ratified today by the Consultative Assembly. Answering criticisms levelled at his ministry's budget, Energy and Natural Resources Minister Fahir Ilkel said that maximum exploitation of local energy resources was his ministry's main target. The minister said that in the year 2000, the country's electric power needs would reach 170 to 210 billion kilowatts. He added that present calculations indicated that Turkey would not be able to meet its needs by then. Recalling that Turkey currently depended on foreign sources for energy, Ilkel said that at present only 16 percent of Turkey's oil needs were met by domestic sources. The energy minister said that countries which had limited energy resources were building nuclear power plants in a bid to meet their energy needs. Ilkel added that some steps might be taken by Turkey in this direction in 1983.

Pointing out that during the first 9 months of 1982, the Turkish Petroleum Corporation's [TPAO] activities in the field of exploration and drilling for oil increased by 55 percent compared to the same period in 1981, the energy minister said that the corporation was expected to drill 32 exploratory and 24 sounding wells. He added that the corporation was expected to commission soon 22 projects connected with irrigation, energy and portable water.

KREISKY SAYS ANDROPOV SEEKS 'NEW BEGINNING'

[AZ report: "Kreisky Hopes for a New Phase of Detente: 'The World May Breathe a Bit More Freely'"]

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- "This is a man who seeks a new beginning." This is how Chancellor Kreisky summed up the first few days of new Kremlin Chief Andropov in an interview with ARBEITER-ZEITUNG. Kreisky had "reckoned upon Andropov's coming" a long time ago and this is why he had invited him as early as this July. The new accents in the Kremlin as well as the lifting of the pipeline embargo by the Reagan administration are arousing Kreisky's optimism. "The world may yet breather a bit more freely," the chancellor state- in connection with this development. The place of Brezhnev, who embodied a great deal of inertia and showed very little flexibility, has now been taken by a man "who is younger, healthier and needs a new profile," Kreisky points out. The manner in which Andropov appeared in the diplomatic society on the occasion of the funeral of his predecessor in Moscow and the new accents which he is placing with respect to China and the Afghanistan problem are regarded by Kreisky as a symptom that "there is a beginning of a new policy."

The U.S. Administration, according to Kreisky, has used the change of leadership in Moscow as an opportunity for "once more rethinking matters" with respect to the problem of the embargo policy. The adminstration has discovered that it would run into great difficulties with the Europeans with its pipeline embargo measures and now has signaled changes in its policy on the occasion of the changeover in the Kremlin.

GOVERNMENT'S STATEMENT ON BREZHNEV DEATH

PM181109 Brussels LE SOIR in French 13-14 Nov 82 p 4

[Statement issued by the Belgian Government 11 November on the death of Leonid Brezhnev]

[Text] The death of Leonid Brezhnev, chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, removes a figure of world stature who for more than 15 years had a major influence not only on the Soviet Union's internal development, but on international events as well.

In view of the vicissitudes of international politics, and more especially those of East-West relations, during that period, we were primarily impressed by the major role he played in the process of drafting the Helsinki Conference's Final Act. Indeed, we had the impression that a new era had been opened during which considerable progress might be made in the sphere of disarmament, respect for human rights and the strengthening of peaceful relations between East and West.

Despite the events which have occurred in recent years, we had the impression that President Brezhnev always tried to prevent international dialogue from reaching complete deadlock.

DAILY SPECULATES ON ADJOURNMENT OF CEMA MEETING

AU192055 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 19 Nov 82 p 2

["P.M." report: "Eastern Bloc Summit Meeting Only in the Coming Year: 'Postponement Gives Time for Reflection'"]

[Text] While an official confirmation of the postponement of the Warsaw Pact summit meeting until next year was still unavailable on Thursday, Eastern diplomats expressed their satisfaction with the "reasonable decision." The compromise achieved on the periphery of Brezhnev's funeral "gives all of us time to reflect on two things: First, it is important to respond to the new leadership style in the Kremlin and to the eventual concomitant corrections of the course. Second, it is now possible to quietly wait and see "whether world policy developments justify an attempt at another rapprochement with the West." Even though unsaid, there is also the hope involved that martial law in Poland could come to an end on 13 December, its first anniversary and that Eastern Europe would thus regain greater freedom of movement.

Poland plays a passive role in the recent controversies carried on behind the scenes. It has been reported that several partners of the Soviet Union have more or less directly linked a further intensification of the overall relations within the Eastern bloc with a reduction in those burdens which have emerged as a result of all sorts of assistance to Warsaw. First and foremost, Czechoslovakia allegedly has pushed for a "rearrangement" of the obligations and rights within the CEMA economic community.

It has not been directly confirmed that this economic aspect also plays a role in the preparations for a summit meeting of the Warsaw Pact (the Political Consultative Committee consists of the state and party heads). Diplomats admit, however, that "political and strategic unity is being promoted through economic harmony." However, since a restructuring of CEMA -- primarily in view of the diverging views -- cannot be achieved from one day to the next, Moscow first wants to politically "put things right."

This is plausible because of the world political situation at the time of the first consultations earlier this year. Even though it now is being officially pointed out that the American sanctions have had no effect at all, people in the know are reporting a 6-to 9-month delay in completing the Siberian-European gas pipeline. And there were no signs of a "normalization" in Poland even at the end of October. The Kremlin did not want to wait "until the problem child in Warsaw had come to rest."

However, the premises have suddenly changed since Brezhnev's death. On the one hand, the new party chief, Andropov, needs a starting time which undoubtedly will extend beyond the personnel decisions at the Central Committee Plenum on 22 November. On the other hand, a certain relaxation is emerging as a result of Lech Walesa's release in Poland. "Andropov could start the new year with a clean slate," an interlocutor says, displaying optimism. It would then also be easier to negotiate with the Americans on disarmament.

CONTENTS OF TREATIES WITH CSSR SUMMARIZED

[Unattributed report: "The Content of the Treaties Signed With the CSSR"]

[Text] On Thursday, five Austrian-Czechoslovak treaties were signed on the occasion of the visit by Czechoslovak President Husak to Austria.

Foreign Ministers Chnoupek and Pahr signed an agreement on the safety of nuclear powerplants close to the border; a treaty on legal assistance in criminal cases; a treaty on extradition; and an agreement on cooperation in the field of health services. Foreign Trade Minister Urban and Finance Minister Salcher signed an agreement on cooperation and mutual assistance in customs affairs.

An old Austrian concern is being settled with the signing of an agreement on solving problems of mutual interest connected with nuclear powerplants. The agreement envisages a regular, general exchange of information concerning nuclear power programs, a specific exchange of information about nuclear powerplants located near the common border and the duty to carry out an immediate notification in the case of breakdowns if this becomes necessary to protect the population living close to the border. This is the first agreement of this nature between an Eastern and Western state.

Signing the treaties on legal aid in criminal cases and on extradition as well as the agreement on cooperation in the field of health services serves to intensify relations with the neighboring CSSR state by way of agreement. Thus, there is a further development of bilateral relations. The three treaties largely comply with analogous agreements which Austria has already concluded with Eastern states, for example, Hungary and Poland.

In essence, the health agreement comprises the exchange of professional information and experiences, whereby the specific areas of cooperation will be defined in periodic plans which will be worked out by the ministries of the two countries.

The agreement on assistance in customs affairs is aimed at placing the cooperation between the customs administrations of the two states on a contractual basis and will facilitate cooperation among the customs authorities on the common border.

[Excerpt] A 3-Billion Schillings Trade Deficit With the CSSR

The trade deficit with the CSSR totaled 3 billion schillings in 1981. In the first 8 months of this year it has already reached 2-6 (2.3) [figures as published] billion schillings. Thus is has grown tenfold since 1978 (313 million schillings). The deficit vis-a-vis the CSSR is mainly determined by Austrian power imports which, for example, totaled 2.5 billion schillings in 1981 out of an overall total of 6.3 billion schillings. Solid fuels totalling just under 1.5 billion schillings occupy first place whereas power imports only account for 72 (79) [figures as published]million schillings, as compared with Austrian electric power exports totalling 53 (72) [figures as published] million schillings.

The interest in increased exports to the CSSR for Austria's economy is great. Austrian entrepreneurs are offering bids for various large projects. Above all, Austria exports to the CSSR machines, industrial plants and vehicles, chemical products as well as various processed goods and finished products. This year -- including August -- Austrian exports to the CSSR have increased by 20 percent to 2.2 billion schillings.

Tourist Traffic With Obstacles

An intensification of tourism is a possibility for reducing the chronic foreign trade deficit with the CSSR. But tourism has shrunk in the past few years. In 1981, 41,612 CSSR citizens visited Austria (9 percent more than in 1980). In the first 8 months of this year, 22,866 persons came (9.5 percent less than in the same 1981 period). The number of nights spent was 69,760, A 10.5 percent decrease. According to available data the number of Austrian visitors to the CSSR totaled 261,926 in 1980, and the number of nights spent is listed as 844,021.

Travel organizers perceive certain visa fee problems for travelers to the CSSR. In addition, it occasionally seems to be difficult to obtain rooms for visitors in the CSSR. Bookings require a relatively long time. Finally, there have also been complaints about slow border processing.

NO U.S.-EUROPE ACCORD ON TRADE WITH USSR

PM191529 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 17 Nov 82 p 6

[Unnamed "Own correspondent" report: "The Hague Denies Existence of an Agreement on Trade With the Russians"]

[Text] The Hague -- The spokesman for the Netherlands Foreign Ministry in The Hague emphatically denied on Tuesday that there is a European-U.S. accord on trade with the Soviet Union on the basis of which the United States decided to lift the sanctions on the construction of the Soviet gas pipeline to Western Europe. The Americans are making it appear as if there is something which counterbalances the U.S. suspension, but this is not the case, the spokesman said.

This means that The Hague's reaction is possibly even tougher than the French response. The French called the existence of an agreement into question; for The Hague there is no question of any doubts. "No agreement has been made," the Foreign Ministry spokesman said.

According to the spokesman, there only have been ambassador-level talks in Washington among the parties involved, including the Netherlands. It was agreed that there should be discussions of the differing views of East-West trade in the appropriate forums in the light of good transatlantic cooperation. On the basis of this, the Americans lifted their sanctions against the gas pipeline, but no formal agreement was made, the spokesman said.

Paper Views Sanctions' End

PM191455 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 15 Nov 82 p 7

[Editorial: "Sanctions Lifted"]

[Text] Happily, President Reagan has lifted his unilateral sanctions against the natural gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe. He did so without getting his own way across the board, and he more or less hinted this in his announcement on Saturday. He wanted firm guarantees from Europe on the limitation of their financial and commerical traffic with the Eastern bloc countries in exchange for lifting the ban on the supply of U.S. natural gas and oil technology to the Soviet Union. But he only gained a European promise that there will be new talks with the Americans on these limitations, as well as on the possibility of buying natural gas elsewhere, before entering into new contracts -- for a second gas pipeline for example -- with the Russians.

The fact that France immediately distanced itself from Reagan's announcement is probably connected with the impression of a U.S. victory which the President wanted to create.

The French reaction is a result of the fact that in the recent U.S.-European talks on the natural gas conflict, France firmly adhered to the demand that Washington put a unilateral end to its unilateral sanctions. France pointed to the completely irrational and arbitrary character of U.S. behavior.

Arbitrary, because the United States went through with its grain supplies, which enable the Soviet Union to invest many billions in its army instead of in its agriculture. And irrational, because the sanctions did more harm to the Western economies and the Western alliance than to the Soviet Union.

In addition, Paris found it unacceptable that the sanctions were obviously not only designed to "punish" the Russians for the introduction of martial law in Poland, but were also intended to make it clear to the Europeans that they had to accept U.S. leadership. This latter consideration can be deduced from a speech Vice President George Bush made in Chicago at the end of August.

Later, London also indicated that it had made no concessions in return for the suspension of U.S. sanctions.

It is probably no coincidence that Washington cut through the Gordian knot of sanctions so soon after the death of Brezhnev and immediately before the departure of a pretty high-level delegation for the Russian state and party leader's funeral. For now, Vice President Bush and Secretary of State Shultz do not need to go to Moscow empty-handed.

Now they have a better point of departure for their contacts with the Russian leadership and a firm basis for their statements in the Russian capital that Washington seeks a more constructive relationship, that it it in favor of a well-prepared U.S.-Soviet summit and that it is hoping for an agreement on a decrease in defense spending.

These statements sound good. And we hope that the significance of the suspension of the U.S. sanctions will reach further than the natural gas pipeline from Siberia.

KOHL ADDRESSES CDU YOUTH ON NATO, USSR

LD201256 Hamburg DPA in German 1217 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Eltville, 20 Nov (DPA) -- Speaking on Saturday at the "Germany Day" of the Young Union [youth wing of the CDU] in Eltville on the Rhine, Chancellor Helmut Kohl defended the economic and social policy of the Federal Government.

Kohl, who was greeted by long applause from the 300 delegates, emphatically spoke in favor of the NATO dual decision. He accused the SPD of gradually trying to sneak out of its defense responsibility, as was proven by its latest decision at the Kiel federal conference. The government, on the other hand, is prepared to keep to negotiations with the Soviet Union, but at the same time is prepared to counter-arm.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON COOPERATION WITH USSR

[Excerpts] Bonn, 19 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner, commenting on the allied strategy debate, today rejected the idea of a limited nuclear war. The Federal Government does not seek war strategies, but adheres to the war-preventing strategy, Woerner said at the second German-American annual conference of the Konrad Adenauer Foundation in Bonn. Woerner called for an offer of cooperation to be made to the Soviet Union which should also address Moscow's interests still more clearly and realistically. Equidistance to Moscow and to the closest and most important alliance partner, Washington, is out of the question, however, since this cannot be the case from Bonn's viewpoint. And the fact that Bonn has to look after its own interests does not change things.

The 3-day conference, attended by prominent German and American politicians, diplomats and scientists, opened with CDU/CSU Group Chairman Alfred Dregger's political situation report: Dregger in the past had expressed doubt about the FDP's election success on 6 March and feared that the Greens would enter the Bundestag. Dregger called for the strengthening of the alliance and emphasized the self-interest linked to this. The Americans also know "that we Germans are indispensible for the United States" if they do not want to leave Europe's potential to the Soviets.

On the first day of the conference, without exception, all speakers expressed their commitment to the NATO dual decision and, as Woerner stressed, to its implementation by the agreed date. In the event of this being the case, Professor Kaltefleiter envisaged the possibility of violent demonstrations akin to civil war in the streets of the Federal Republic.

Richard Allen described the assumption of office by the Kohl/Genscher government as the starting point for a new era in German-American relations. President Reagan's former security adviser sees this as an excellent opportunity to introduce the "necessary fundamental change in German Ostpolitik." The conservative American politician also vigorously opposed allowing Andropov a honeymoon period." After all, the new Soviet general secretary has seen this transitional period coming for a long time. The West should no longer cherish the illusion that Andropov is a secret liberal.

Allen called for closer German-American contacts, not only at higher levels, but also through an intensified youth exchange. Such cooperation would replace the period of misunderstandings, which range from a Central America policy harmful for the United States to the problems of trade with the East. Primarily using the example of Central America, Allen tried to show that European support for revolutionary movements ultimately had led to leftwing governments, with which the United States has then been confronted on its own doorstep.

Geneva Talks Assessed

[Text] Bonn, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The American-Soviet negotiations in Geneva on medium-range missiles are nearing a "critical phase." This was reported on Saturday by Robert Grey, deputy director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, at the second German-American annual conference of the Konrad Adenauer Foundation, which was also attended by the American chief negotiator, Paul Nitze. Grey saw "some success" in the present stage of negotiations, but it could be greater if one succeeded in stopping the Soviet Union from desiring pressure on public opinion in West Europe which would be favorable to them.

Lothar Ruehl, secretary of state in the Ministry of Defense, agreed with the assessment that a critical phase is near in Geneva. However, this also applies to the Soviet Union, as it will soon have to make a choice between reality and propaganda. For Moscow there is no sensible reason for it to politically endanger the whole East-West relationship by intransigence. Whoever expected concrete movement in the direction of negotiating success in Geneva before spring 1983 is underestimating the Soviet Union.

Ruehl also made it clear why stationing medium-range missiles at sea -- which has repeatedly been brought into the debate -- is out of the question: Any agreement depends on its effective verification, and since missiles at sea -- unlike land-based missiles -- cannot be counted and thus verified, this alternative is senseless.

In the security policy discussion on the second day of the conference, NATO Supreme Commander Gen Bernard Rogers repeated his demand for an increase in national defense contributions to 4 percent. Only then can the super-modern strategies for conventionally strengthening forces with the use of electronic technology be implemented. This conventional strengthening cannot replace nuclear deterrence, but it could make its use less probable. In the discussion, Rogers conceded that at present an increase in defense expenditure is rather improbable.

Discussing peace movements in America and Europe, Alois Merten, minister of state in the Foreign Ministry, warned of the dangers of the "foolish attempt" to indiscriminately charge such movements with having communist motives.

Paper Views Reduction Talks

[Robert Held editorial: "The Dilemma in Geneva"]

[Text] With amazing swiftness, the new Federal Government has made some statements on counterarmament. First, it said that a general interpretation of the dual decision was out of the question, meaning that 108 Pershing II missiles will be stationed and not 108 delivery systems with additional missiles in reserve. Second, actually beginning deployment in April is out of the question.

The Federal Government isn't forced to make these statements, unless it shares the currently held view that each press report must be viewed as a kind of public pressure which requires a response. We are noting this cautiously to make sure our following considerations are correctly understood. They concern the problem of who will be blamed if the Geneva negotiations on the reduction of medium-range missiles fail. Signposts are already being set up to point at the Americans. The Americans are suspected of not having a serious desire to make the talks a success.

This interpretation is based on the central goal of the current negotiations, the zero solution, as it is also called by the Americans. In the American view, this zero solution means the dismantling of all medium-range missiles threatening the Soviet Unions's neighbors, that is, its new SS-20's and its older SS-4's and SS-5's which are equipped with a total of 1,000 nuclear warheads. In return, NATO offers to forego the stationing of 572 cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles in Europe equipped with one warhead each. The Soviets, who would prefer not to give up the SS-20's at all, are opposed to this calculation because in all disarmament calculations the Soviets hold the view that Soviet nuclear power must not just counterbalance America's potential, but the total of all neighboring powers, including France, Great Britain and China. This also applies to future calculations regarding START, which involves intercontinental missiles. This kind of calculation is simplistic as well as unacceptable for the United States. It is obvious that the American nuclear power cannot grant the Soviet Union a concession simply because China also has missiles. The Soviets are trying to turn their apprehensions about being encircled into a positive argument. This cannot be accepted by the leading Western power with its international involvement.

We should not accept this either. However, differences on this already existed under the previous government. In the negotiations on the zero solution, the Soviets want to achieve compensation for the existing nuclear power of the French and British. Some experts on the German side said we should understand and allow for this. The Americans hold a different view, and in fact this has already created a certain prospect for failure at the Geneva conference. For those German critics (who will add grist to the mills of the counterarmament opponents and the peace movement proponents), the question of guilt is already resolved. The new government, above all its FDP segment, willalso look to the forthcoming discussions with uneasiness.

The Americans have little understanding of this. Their military argument is that for many years the French and British land-based systems have been included in so many ways in the target programs of earlier Soviet missile systems that the Soviets do not at all need the SS-20's to cover them now.

Anyway, there is no way for this business to be discussed in Geneva. Bilateral Soviet-American negotiations are involved, with the Americans consulting the Europeans. However, there is no possibility of including the French and British nuclear powers in a trade. Even if they wanted to, the Americans cannot ask the British and French to give them this mandate, nor could the French and British give it to them. Let's take the example of the French. The rational basis of French defense is that the protection of French territory depends on the deterrent effect of its own nuclear power, which is not committed to anyone else.

Those Germans who refuse to realize this do not understand the current international nuclear order, which will determine the power structure for a long time to come.

For the very reason that the two big powers have almost all the privileges and totally deny the concept of equality of states -- at least in the nuclear field -- for this reason the second-class nuclear powers are all the more intent on retaining the special position that is left to them. The greatest response to world domination by the two nuclear powers was nuclear Gaullism. France cannot give up this status of nuclear sovereignty, which actually has become a compulsive role, and the Americans have to respect that. Thus, there are no prospects for modifying the concept of a zero solution at the expense of the second-class nuclear powers. Any German ideas in this respect are based on provincial wishful thinking at best.

EXCERPTS FROM TEXT OF SPD'S KIEL DECLARATION

[Excerpts] Kiel, 19 Nov (DPA) -- On Friday, the SPD conference in Kiel, in its first meeting since the change of government in Bonn, reemphasized the Social Democrats' claim to political leadership with its "Kiel declaration." The following are excerpts from the text of the declaration.

"The parliamentary parties of the new government coalition in the Bundestag have forced Chancellor Helmut Schmidt out of office without the agreement of the voters and with crude disregard by the FDP for the electoral mandate specifically obtained 2 years ago. The new Federal Government attempts to rectify its clear lack of political legitimacy by promising, as a transitional government, new elections in the near future. We Social Democrats demand the fulfillment of this promise without further delay, without tactical ploys and without manipulation of the Constitution.

"The SPD will...begin a political offensive at the local level. In this, our primary goal will be the securing of local financial autonomy.

"The work force was always the basis of Social Democracy. Although different social groups have found their place with us, in the future the strongest source of our strength lies in the links with employees and trade unions too.

"We fight for the right to work and education. We fight to overcome material want and undignified dependence. In so doing, we are fighting for true freedom and economic democracy, that is, for the expansion of participation at all levels and for the participation of employees in productive capital.

"Unemployment is and remains for us unacceptable. The overcoming of it is the great task of German domestic policy as well as of the international economic policy of the FRG.

"In its opposition role the SPD, will continue to offer evidence of its ability to govern. We declare our support for the policies which Helmut Schmidt as chancellor again stated in 12 points in his 1 October 1982 speech:

1. All national economies are currently in the process of adjusting themselves to the crisis. In this the struggle against unemployment, meaning for new economic growth, has priority for us. We defend the social state, its capacity to balance out and for social security.

2. We are convinced of the possibility and need to balance economic and environmental interests.

3. We stand firmly by the principle of solidarity with the weaker and strongly reject redistribution from those below to those above.

4. We will oppose every attempt to restrict social justice and to replace it with the elbow principle.

5. We will defend with all possible force our fundamental values and the inner freedom of our community.

6. We will conscientiously and emphatically concern ourselves with the credibility of democracy, its institutions and those persons actively involved.

7. We will support goodneighborly relations in central Europe and a foreign policy in the spirit of readiness for peace and peaceableness.

8. We continue to adhere to the European Community, to the North Atlantic alliance, to German-American friendship and to German-French cooperation.

9. We will urge that German foreign policy maintain continuity in reconciliation with the East.

10. We want all opportunities to be taken advantage of in intra-German affairs for strengthening the feeling of all Germans have concerning common bond and for making it possible to actually experience that feeling.

11. We affirm the contribution of the Bundeswehr to the joint defense of the West, hold firm to universal compulsory military service and call for an end to the oral examination procedure and a lengthening of the period of civilian service only within the strictest framework of the jurisdiction of the federal constitutional court.

12. We insist on the FRG's demand that the superpowers arrive at nuclear disarmament along the path of negotiations. As regards on medium-range missiles between the United States and the USSR, we will not grow tired of urging the USSR to make a move. And we will always continue to ask our American friend to make the greatest efforts to make the installation of new weapons superfluous. Through the policy of agreed, gradual disarmament with approximate parity, we are striving for a partnership leading to security...."

VOGEL ON POSSIBLE CDU MINORITY GOVERNMENT

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The SPD's nominee for chancellor, Hans-Jochen Vogel, does not rule out the possibility that after the federal elections in March, the SPD might tolerate a minority CDU government. In an interview on North German Radio Saturday, Vogel pointed out the example of the CDU-led Senat in Berlin.

On several occasions the policy of the mayor, Richard Weizsaecker, has enjoyed the support of the SPD, even on important issues. Vogel said that if the SPD needed a partner in order to rule in Bonn, he would orient himself according to the Weizsaecker model, who in a minority situation looked for support for his policy where he could find it.

Vogel said that a coalition between the SPD and the Greens is not an issue. The SPD chancellor candidate excluded the possibility of a coalition with the CDU/CSU as long as the FRG is not in a real emergency situation.

FDP DEPUTY HELGA SCHUCHARDT QUITS PARTY

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 21 Nov (DPA) -- Following other prominent FDP members, Helga Schuchardt, Bundestag deputy from Hamburg and former FDP land chairman, quit the party today. In a message to the FDP Federal Executive, Frau Schuchardt stated as her main reason for leaving the fact that the FDP is no longer the party for which she successfully campaigned to gain the electorate's trust in three Bundestag elections.

Frau Schuchardt announced that she will remain in the Bundestag as an independant. She will not carry over to another party the mandate that she won from the electorate on the promise of implementing a social-liberal policy.

FRG, GDR OFFICIALS OPEN NEW SECTION OF AUTOBAHN

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 20 Nov (DPA) — Federal Transport Minister Werner Dollinger and his GDR counterpart, Otto Arndt, underlined the significance of the transit routes for relations between the two German states on the occasion of the opening of the Hamburg-Berlin Autobahn on Saturday. At his meeting with Arndt at the Western crossing point at Gudow, Dollinger said that the Federal Government desires a continuation of the cooperation between the two countries. Previously, at a meeting with construction workers at Wittenburg prior to the opening of the GDR section, Arndt had stressed that the GDR is still adhering to its policy of peaceful coexistence with the FRG.

Dollinger, at his meeting with Arndt, said that it should become a matter of course that ministers of both states get together to discuss questions of mutual interest. The Federal Government is interested in comprehensive and long-term agreements for the benefit of the people. Since the signing of the transit agreement on 17 December 1971, and the traffic agreement, which has been in force for 10 years, traffic between the GDR and the FRG has risen considerably. According to Dollinger, both ministers also spoke about the problem of the minimum exchange levy, but no compromise on the part of the GDR is to be noted.

Arndt did not take part in the joint press conference, as had been originally announced. Dollinger said his counterpart explained this by saying that he had already given a press conference in Zarrentin. Dollinger then drove with his counterpart across the FRG crossing-point at Gudow into the GDR.

When opening the 34km-long section on the FRG side, between Witzhave (Stormarn area) and Gudow at the GDR border, Dollinger stressed that the new link represented a significant contribution to the preservation of Berlin's capacity to survive. In constructing this section, the FRG had taken into consideration the problems of landscape protection, the ecology and noise control.

RED ARMY BOMB THREAT SEEKS TERRORIST'S RELEASE

[Text] Wiesbaden, 20 Nov (DPA) -- After a telephoned bomb threat, the Second German Television [ZDF] sports studio was cleared tonight as a telecast was in progress. The 150 spectators were sent home and the broadcasters moved to an adjacent studio.

ZDF said that at about 2143 GMT, a caller claiming to speak for the Red Army faction demanded that sports broadcaster Dieter Kuerten read a demand for the release of the terrorist, Christian Klar. If he refused, a bomb, the caller said, would go off at 2200 GMT. Even after the ultimatum had expired, police searched but could find no bomb.

Klar was captured earlier this week in the Sachsenwald Forest near Hamburg.

ANARCHISTS CLAIM CREDIT FOR PARIS ATTACKS

NC201406 Paris AFP in English 1313 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 20 (AFP) -- The little-known anarchist Bakunin-Gdansk Group today claimed responsibility for two explosive attacks last night aimed at the Paris offices of the South African citrus fruit firm Outspan and a French chemical company.

The group has claimed 12 such attacks since December 20 1981 -- the week after martial law was proclaimed in Poland. Targets were multi-national firms and firms doing business with the Soviet bloc and Latin America.

A communique addressed to AFP news agency was found in a Paris building today after an anonymous phone call. The message was signed by the "internationalist hooligans, GBGPGS-Bakunin group". The letters GBGPGS stand for Group Bakunin-Gdansk-Paris-Guatemala-El Salvador.

The Outspan offices were devastated by a bomb planted on the landing outside the door. Several other offices in the same building were also damaged.

The group's second target was the firm Promo-Chimie in the plush business area near the Champs Elysees. Damage there was only slight.

Earlier targets of the same group include the Soviet watch and jewel company SLAVA, a firm selling Franco-American built ITT television sets [as received] the Chilean airline offices, an importer of Argentine meat and a firm selling Polish goods.

The group opposes indiscriminately "the Soviet bureaucratic order" and "American imperialism".

LE MONDE VIEWS FRANCE-UK SUMMIT RESULTS

PM161131 Paris LE MONDE in French 7-8 Nov 82 p 1

[Editorial: "Entente Cordiale by Default"]

[Text] "There is going to be trouble over the Community budget. People could become heated as the elections approach." When Mrs Thatcher and Mr Mitterrand were taking leave of each other with forced smiles in Paris, Mr Hurd, the British minister responsible for Europe, was brandishing a familiar bugaboo in Edinburgh: "Do something or we cannot be answerable for what the British voter does." Britain's partners are all too well aware that the British Government, whatever its nature, will begin to attack the Community again to ensure that the threat has an effect.

The only practical result of the summit on 4 and 5 November was to set up montly meetings "between the two governments' representatives" with the job of examining "existing disputes." That is not a great deal.

Another positive aspect of the Paris meeting was the lifting of an indefensible British health embargo on French turkeys, guilty of being too cheap (the opposite accusation being leveled at dairy products). But that "concession" comes too late to open up the market on the other side of the channel to Christmas turkeys.

Differences on current problems were not overcome. Mrs Thatcher was particularly delighted at the French abstention in the UN Falklands debate since she had been dropped by the Americans.

But, as regards the essential issue, Mr Mitterrand expressed the hope for the opening of negotiations which cast doubt on sovereignty over the archipelago, whereas in Mrs Thatcher's view it cannot be called into question.

With regard to the gas pipeline and the U.S. embargo, there is also more than just a slight difference of opinion between the two governments. France accepts "consultation" with the Americans on East-West trade but rejects any political concession in exchange for lifting the embargo, whereas Britain would readily make some concessions to satisfy U.S. egotism.

That leaves the main stumbling block and the apocalypse referred to by Mr Hurd: the reduction of payments to the Community budget demanded by Mrs Thatcher. The British prime minister asserted that the question is "virtually settled" for 1982. It must be said, once again, that Mr Mitterrand was less categorical. But the long-term settlement has not made any progress at all. Paris and London, Mr Mitterrand said, do not agree on the "concept" of the problem. For Paris, "it is a temporary problem" to which a digressive solution must be found, whereas for London it is a permanent situation which requires a permanent remedy.

When the left came to power in France, Paris and London stressed the improvement in their relations. Today it can be assessed less on the basis of the number of disputes settled as on the sole fact that their persistence is not leading to an open crisis. It is "entente cordiale by default."

SPADOLINI CONFIRMS DECISION TO DEPLOY MISSILES

[Text] (ANSA) Venice, November 20 — Premier Giovanni Spadolini, who heads Italy's caretaker Government, reconfirmed his nation's position in favor of updating the NATO nuclear defense system through the deployment of 572 cruise and Pershing II intermediate range missiles in Europe in a letter sent Friday to the Symposium underway here on the theme, nuclear defense in Europe.

In his statement to the seminar, sponsored by the Italian Atlantic Committee, a non-governmental member of the Atlantic Treaty Association, Spadolini referred to what he described as the need to continue East-West disarmament negotiations from a position of parity for the West. "The choice of deploying European strategic missiles in Comiso, Sicily, was made for the purpose of guaranteeing these conditions of balance", the outgoing premier said in this message and added, "This is an indispensible premise for the necessary detente dialogue with the East for the higher end of peace and guaranteed stability in the world".

Italy endorsed the NATO missile decision in December of 1979. The cruise missiles earmarked for Italian territory will be installed towards the end of the coming year unless the NATO decision is reversed as a result of developments in the Soviet-United States talks in Geneva on European theater nuclear weapons.

PCI'S NAPOLITANO REVIEWS PCI-PSI 'CONVERGENCES'

PM191157 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 17 Nov 82 p 2

[PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano interview by Alberto Stabile in Rome on 17 November]

[Excerpt] Rome — [Question] You propose the method of the alternative and argue the need for an understanding among the leftwing forces. Do you believe that [PSI Secretary] Craxi's recent remarks about defending incomes' purchasing power move in this direction?

[Answer] Those statements by Craxi reflect convergences that already exist in part or that can exist between the PCI's and PSI's stances on economic and social policy. They should be examined further. Convergences should also be sought on matters concerning government methods and the management of the public corporations, as well as, of course, on matters concerning the political prospects.

[Question] But during the August government crisis [PCI Secretary General] Berlinguer, perhaps realizing the alternative was not just around the corner, proposed an intermediate stage: The "different kind of government." Why is the PCI no longer talking about this?

[Answer] In the months since August, some important events have occurred that prompt us to emphasize not only the question of how the government is formed and the relationship between parties and institutions, but also substantive matters, and to demand above all an economic and social policy capable of dealing with a crisis that is now dramatic in accordance with principles of real equity, genuine rigorousness and thorough regeneration.

[Question] But it is also being said that in August you feared the propsect of early elections, whereas now you expect to surmount internal uncertainties and difficulties by gathering the votes of the malcontents.

[Answer] We were not guided then and we are not guided now by such partisan and questionable calculations. Indeed, we believe that the country must be given a government capable of working responsibly until the natural expiry of the legislative period.

PRESS COMMENT ON ATTEMPTS TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 19 -- Political comment in today's editions of Italian dailies focused on the progress being made by Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani to form a new ruling coalition in Italy.

Rome's "IL TEMPO" said that Fanfani seems to have good chances to create what will be his fifth government. Rome's "PAESE SERA" agreed that Fanfani has made big strides but he does not want just a revival of past governments or a coalition which is destined to fail in a few months. Turin's "LA STAMPA" said that the major hurdles were set by the Socialist Party. They have been set aside for the time being, but will re-emerge when discussion of the platform and appointment of ministers gets under way. Milan's financial daily "IL SOLE 24 ORE" predicted that Fanfani may have completed his task by the end of the month but still has to cross the hurdle of presenting an economic platform to deal with the burgeoning deficit and labor costs.

The wounded and handicapped Palestinians, many of them transferred to Damascus from the Lebanese capital earlier, where immediately taken to lodgings at Caselle, near Turin where Msgr Hilarion Capucci, the head of the Malkite Community expelled from Israel and now residing in Rome, was on hand to welcome them.

POLICE ARREST NINE IN RED BRIGADES HIDEOUTS

LD202100 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Excerpt] The Milan Carabinieri have dealt a heavy blow to the Red Brigades Walter Alasia Column. Here is a report from Milan:

By arresting nine people and detaining a number of others and by discovering four terrorist bases in Lombardy, the Carabinieri of Milan region consider that they have dealt a very heavy blow to the Red Brigades Walter Alasia Column which, although mainly destroyed, was being reconstituted in the area of Piedmont and Lombardy. Yesterday and today, four people were arrested and four operational bases were discovered at Carenno in Bergamo Province and at Chiarelli in Como Province. The investigations had an important twist when the base at Cinisello Balsamo outside Milan was discovered a few days ago. Another hideout was found in Via Servio in Milan. That also belonged to the Walter Alasia Column and other Red Brigades columns. Arms, explosives and information on the movements and habits of members of the forces of order and the magistrature were found. The arms included two automatic rifles.

Five More Arrested

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 22 -- Five Red Brigade terrorist suspects were arrested over the weekend in Rome and Naples, police in the two cities reported.

The three captured in Rome and charged with "participation in an armed band", were identified only as two students and one analyst in training who dropped out of sight a number of months ago. A spokesman for the police said that the trio had apparently been recruited only recently into the terrorist organization and had not yet been given any specific duties. Equipment for the forgery of documents and recent Brigades "resolutions" were found in the apartment they were occupying at the time of their arrest.

The pair taken into custody in Naples were identified as Antonio Baldari, 24, and his girlfriend, Lucia Cuccolo, 21, who allegedly maintained contact between the Naples cadre of the Brigades and convicted terrorists serving time in the maximum security prison of Palmi through visits to a brother convicted on charges of belonging to Prima Linea (Front Line), a terrorist grouping which flanks the Brigades. The girl's apartment was said to contain terrorist propaganda.

FORMER MINISTER DENIES TERRORIST CHARGES

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 20 -- Revelations that a former Italian Government minister, Socialist M.P. Giacomo Mancini, is under judicial investigation in connection with "participation in an armed gang" and terrorist charges, has sent shock waves throughout the country. Mancini confirmed yesterday's reports appearing in the weekly "L'ESPRESSO' that a Rome judge investigating the periodical "METROPOLI", published a few years ago in Rome by a group of the extreme left "autonomy" movement, has issued a judicial communication against Mancini.

The note said that the investigation covers "participation in a subversive association in an armed gang... with the aim of violently subverting the state's economic and social order". According to the judge, Mancini allegedly helped "finance" the armed gang through the "CERPET" (Committee for Economic and Territorial Research and Planning) which had "apparently licit ends for research.. but was actually directed at gathering funds to carry out the gang's plans". The judge established the link between CERPET and the Socialist M.P. through the fact that in 1974 Mancini was minister of the "Fund for the South" which earmarked funds to the association. Since several militants of the "autonomy" movement worked for CERPET, the judge has charged that "METROPOLI" was financed with CERPET's funds.

Mancini has rejected the charges and sent a letter to the judge asking that the investigation documents be sent to the speaker of the lower house to begin discussion for a parliamentary inquiry into the whole affair. Mancini claims that the ordinary magistrature does not have jurisdiction to investigate ministers and former ministers. "METROPOLI" became famous in 1978 when, after the murder of Christian Democrat politician Aldo Moro at the hands of the Red Brigades, the periodical carried a comic strip illustrating the 55 days of Moro's imprisonment by the terrorist kidnappers.

Later today, the Socialist Party Secretariat described the charge of participation in an armed gang which may be filed against their former cabinet minister as "totally absurd". In a note released in the afternoon on the judiciary investigation into the alleged link between Mancini and the extreme leftist publication, METROPOLI, the Socialist Secretariat said that, "questions are raised on the nature and the objective of such a serious initiative" and urged that the "necessary clarity" be shed on the case in the near future. Socialist M.P.S., rallying in support of Mancini, branded the summons he received from the judiciary as "unjust and reckless".

The executive met all evening and national radio's requests for information were answered with silence. However, this program, "24 Hours", received confirmation of the disbandment from one of the people present at the meeting. Nothing will be made public, we were told, until Blas Pinar speaks over the weekend. While yet another procession of Falangists set off on foot for the Valley of the Fallen [Franco's burial place and nationalist memorial], the New Force was making this decision. Pinar had said that if they won the elections they would dissolve all parties. With their defeat, it is they who have had to disband. The future of this political force is not yet known. The organization, it appears, could continue as an association. It is impossible at the moment to pinpoint its aims and [word indistinct]. It is not difficult, however, to predict internal tensions. Now we must await the reaction of this group of militants usually linked with the actions of the violent extreme right. [Passage indistinct]

ANDROPOV: IMPLICATIONS OF HIS ELECTION ON POLICY

[Rafael Paro Editorial: "A New Era in the Soviet Union"]

[Text] The post of party chief is the most important post in Soviet society. Through its selection of 68-year-old Yuriy Andropov as the party's new general secretary on Friday, the CPSU's Central Committee, in a surprisingly swift move, put an end to speculations about who would take over the important post after Leonid Brezhnev.

It was Central Committee Secretary Konstantin Chernenko who nominated Andropov in a speech on the instructions of the Politburo. Chernenko himself had been thought to be Andropov's main rival for the party chief's post. Now it is expected that Chernenko will become president instead.

The swift decision in Moscow indicates that the matter had been prepared for some time. There are reports of plans that Brezhnev would retire at the end of this year because of the state of his health, and the effective backdrop to this would have been the summit between the Eastern bloc's leaders. However, Brezhnev's death meant that the blueprint for the power handover had to be used earlier than expected.

Among other things, Yuriy Andropov is known as a clever strategist. His biggest problem at present is probably the great expectations being attached to him, both in the Soviet Union and the rest of the world. For this reason, we should not be surprised if in the next few months he primarily devotes his attention to taking the edge off all exaggerated expectations by acting extremely cautious. In his speech on Friday, he promised to adhere to the program for the building of communism drawn up by the 26th CPSU Party Congress and to ensure continuity in economic and defense policy above all else. He also promised to strengthen peace and pursue all the Leninist domestic and foreign policy objectives to which the Soivet Union had addressed itself under Leonid Brezhnev.

Even though Andropov's power position is, it would seem, a better base than it might first appear from outside the Soviet Union, it will take time for it to become firmly established. There is a considerable difference between a Soviet party chief and a U.S. president. For example, in a general election a U.S. president wins an indisputable mandate for a 4-year term.

A Soviet party chief can stay in office until he dies, Brezhnev demonstrated, provided he is able to assert his leadership. If he fails, his time in office can be short.

Andropov is not thought to have belonged to the "Brezhnev clan." He has neither Khrushchev nor Brezhnev to thank for his position. It is said that his first and only real patron was Otto Ville Kuusinen.

The general view at least among Western observers is that there is a certain amount of pressure coming from the younger generations in the Soviet Union and that this pressure is being directed at the relatively aged leadership which the country has had. There are also strong calls for reforms. It is obvious that Andropov was the best equipped of the possible candidates to accept these challenges and in the long term protect the party's position as a leading force in society. This is why many people are preparing themselves for the paradox that the former KBG chief could turn out to be more progressive than the party he was appointed to protect from reformists.

There are some indications that relatively conservative, tough and dogmatic views are common among Soviet party officials between 45 and 50. This generation never experienced the major purges and therefore has greater sympathy with Stalinism than the older generation. Faced with the tendencies toward laxness and corruption which sometimes become visible in Soviet society, these "young Turks" could reach the view that a little Stalinist discipline would not be out of place. At the same time, the younger generation is better educated and has greater self-confidence for the attack on structural problems in the Soviet Union.

The Brezhnev era passed with relatively few changes. Various Soviet analyses and debate articles on the need for reforms in planning, industry and agriculture went more or less unheard at the highest levels. The general view is that the experiences from the experiments in Czechoslovakia in 1968 and the current crisis in Poland have had a deterrent effect. If agreement on a new line is to be achieved, it must involve the assumption that the ideological aspects of privatization and decentralization should not be taken so seriously. But the party's influence must be preserved intact no matter what.

The assumption that can be made therefore, is that possible reforms in the Soviet Union could be combined with a tougher, perhaps even repressive regime; or as Simon Head wrote in an article in the New York Review of Books: The Soviet Union's enterprise chiefs as specialists will be given greater freedom than in the past, but as citizens in Soviet society they will find themselves under closer surveillance than ever.

While the appointment of Yuriy Andropov as party chief is a sign of continuity and continued collective leadership, it also means the beginning of a new era. The new elements which we can expect will chiefly affect domestic policy -- new efforts to strengthen the Soviet Union economically. How successful this attempt is will decide how Soviet foreign policy will be shaped in the longer term. But there is nothing to indicate that there will be any sudden changes in the near future.

NORWAY

AFTENPOSTEN ON REAGAN'S SANCTIONS DECISION

[Editorial: "An End to Punitive Measures"]

[Text] The fact that President Ronald Reagan has now lifted the punitive measures against West European firms supplying equipment to the Soviet gas pipeline is probably due more to practical than ideological considerations. First, the measures did not have the desired effect.

They were able to delay, but not prevent the construction of the Soviet gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe. In other words, what seemed ideologically desirable was not practically possible.

Second, the decision made by Reagan in mid-June this year put a serious strain on relations between the United States and its European allies, primarily West Germany, Britain, France and Italy -- as well as Japan. These are all interested in exporting goods to the Soviet Union at a time when jobs are at risk in the whole of the industrilized world. Reagan's secretary of state at the time, Alexander Haig, was opposed to the sanctions but was unable to avert them. His successor, George Shultz, obviously possesses diplomatic and intellectual skills of a completely different order. In the tedious work to bring about an agreement, he must have played a significant role in his quiet but effective way.

The sanctions were based on the assumption which has always formed the foundation for such measures: Through economic pressure from outside, it is possible to get a state or a government to pursue a policy different from the one it has decided to follow -- and in which it has invested much prestige. This is an appealing thought in a world in which, to put it mildly, many governments could have behaved better. If we take the last 50 years of history, there is not much material to support such an assumption.

The sanctions against Benito Mussolini's Italy after the Ethiopian campaign in the thirties were sorely ineffective. Even such a small nation as Ian Smith's Rhodesia was able to resist pressure after its unilateral declaration of independence 17 years ago. And a superpower like the Soviet Union must obviously be influenced using other means, to the extent that this is possible. One of the clear reasons behind the buildup of that country's military strength in the last 20 years is that those in power in the Kremlin should be able, as far as possible, to do what they want, regardless of what the rest of the world might think. In this respect, Leonid Brezhnev made a contribution which will assure him a place in Soviet history. In the light of this, there was a sort of meaning behind his grandiose funeral yesterday with all its old-Russian, religious overtones.

Reagan's explanation of the decision to lift the sanctions said that there will now be an investigation into the West's energy resources and needs. The aim is to prevent Europe becoming an energy hostage of the Soviet Union -- a development which would give the Russians greater scope for threats and pressure. This is hardly likely to happen with the quantities of energy which the West is buying initially. However, there is a need for closer coordination of Western policies toward the Soviet Union. The lifting of sanctions after the diplomatic negotiations in the last few weeks is an important first step.

WILLOCH ACCUSED OF OVERSTATING MISSILE ISSUE

PM191525 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 13 Nov 82 p 4

[Editorial: "Missiles and Prestige"]

[Text] There is at present every indication that the so-called "missile affair" will split the Storting roughly down the middle. Some 78 deputies will support the government's proposal and 77 will support the Labor Party view on the issue. Bearing this fact in mind, we think it remarkable that Prime Minister Kare Willoch should choose to transform the matter into an important, almost crucial issue in Norwegian foreign and security policy. Among other things, the prime minister has said that the Labor Party position represents a clear break with our NATO commitments.

The prime minister's assertions fail by their own preposterousness. If the "missile affair" were presently a fundamental issue in Norwegian security policy and affected vital interests within the NATO alliance, both Prime Minister Willoch and Defense Minister Sjaastad could count on a different distribution of votes in the Storting.

The fact is, the government is now using exaggerated words simply because it does not want to retreat for reasons of prestige. In objective terms, even those at the center of government must be able to see it is the Labor Party's proposal which has the strongest foundation.

It is the government itself which has, completely unnecessarily, pushed forward the question of Norwegian appropriations for preparations for the deployment of medium-range missiles in Western Europe. The total bill for 1983 would be 3 million kroner, which in the present context must be described as a minuscule amount.

But it is not the actual amount which is at the center of the affair. The question of the deployment of new nuclear missiles in NATO nations is connected with the negotiations in Geneva on European nuclear arms reductions. Possible future deployment will be decided in the light of the negotiating situation at the end of 1983.

The Labor Party's refusal to support direct appropriations for preparatory work at the present time is partly due to the fact that the matter has not been given final political treatment in two of the countries in which deployment could take place — Belgium and the Netherlands. The Parliaments in these two countries have neither voted on the question of deployment nor approved funds for preparatory work. In the Labor Party's view, it would be unsuitable for Norway to be a spearhead in such a situation. This would not be in line with our nuclear and base policy. Given that we will not have these missiles under any circumstances, it must be wrong to grant funds for preparatory work in countries which could have them but which have not yet made up their minds.

This is the background to the possibility that the entire Labor Party Storting group could support a proposal that the missile decision be postponed until the fall of 1983. In other words, we are talking about a decision on the matter in the same year it could be affected by the government's present proposal. It is also worth noting that the main part of the preparatory work will take place after 1983.

The advantages of waiting are that we would then have a better foundation on which to debate and decide the issue. We would know more about the Geneva negotiations and the treatment the issue had received in the parliaments of the countries where the new NATO weapons could be deployed. In short, it is a practical question of whether the granting of funds totaling 3 million kroner for deployment preparations would take place now, or be postponed until the fall of 1983.

It takes a lot of imagination to portray the proposal for a postponement as a decisive break with important aspects of Norwegian foreign and security policy. We believe the prime minister ought to tone down his statements so that he will not fall into the grave he is digging himself. If the issue is as important as Prime Minister Willoch makes out, it must be a weak political leadership when it is unable to convince half the Norwegian Storting.

LABOR PARTY SHIFT ON EUROMISSILES 'REGRETTABLE'

[Editorial: "Breaking the Agreement"]

[Text] Fully aware of the possible damaging effect both on Norway's relations with NATO and on the further negotiations on nuclear arms limitations in Europe, the Norwegian Labor Party's Storting group has reached a unanimous decision which amounts to a clear break with our commitments with regard to NATO's dual decision from December 1979.

The agreement is one in which both the Nordli and Harlem Brundtland governments were involved, and under which Norway committed itself to bearing some of the cost of the preparatory work connected with the possible future deployment of modernized medium-range missiles. This preparatory work is in fact the strongest negotiating card we have, because it shows that if the Soviet Union has no concessions to make, new nuclear arms will be deployed in the West — to reestablish balance. The aim of this negotiating strategy on NATO's part is to make the deployment of new missiles in the West superfluous as part of an agreement on mutual balanced disarmament.

Now the Labor Party is saying "No" to both the negotiating strategy and to the agreements in which the party itself was involved when it had government power, and for the first time in the postwar period, the Labor Party is thus contributing to deep disagreement on a fundamental security question. When the question of Norwegian commitments with respect to the dual decision comes to a vote on 22 November, the Storting will be split down the middle, since it is expected that the government's proposal will be adopted by the smallest majority possible.

The Labor Party's position means that the national unity, to which all parties up to now have attached the greatest importance in defense and security questions, no longer exists. And the responsibility for this rests with the Labor Party alone, which is deliberately breaking the agreements and commitments Norway has been involved in as a NATO member. The Storting group's decision is all the more regrettable because the governing Conservative Party has not eschewed any means of being able to maintain as broad agreement as possible. We can only note that the Labor Party has not attached much importance to these efforts.

Through several channels — and at the highest political level — there have been persistent attempts to find a common platform on which the government and the parties supporting it and the Labor Party could agree. However, in questions affecting the country's security, there must of necessity be clear limits to how far it is possible to go toward a compromise. It goes without saying that there can be no question of the incumbent government taking part in the violation of an agreement with the defense alliance of which Norway is a member and on which Norway is more dependent than any other NATO nation.

'COMPETENT, EFFECTIVE' ANDROPOV BETTER FOR WEST

[Editorial: "Andropov Takes the Reins"]

[Text] When a top Soviet politician has been the leader of the secret police for 15 years, it should come as no surprise that he shows a sure touch and a clear idea of what should be given priority when he takes over the reins as the Communist Party's general secretary.

In circles knowledgeable about such things, there is respect for the KGB's professional competence, and you do not need to approve the moral or ideological basis for Yuriy Andropov's exercise of power -- either in the past or in the future -- to have a certain amount of admiration for his practical achievements.

Both German President Karl Carstens and U.S. Vice President George Bush said they had been impressed by the new Kremlin leader's insight into international questions. Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua has extended his stay in Moscow to hold more talks with top Soviet people, and the East European party bosses have had to make do with ceremonial talks. This does not necessarily mean that the Warsaw Pact summit next month will be anything other than as planned -- and Andropov will be able to talk with his closest foreign subordinates then.

However, this can also be taken as a diect reminder that he, better than the other Soviet leaders, knows the true state of things in Eastern Europe. One problem for one-party dictatorships is that accurate information is often twisted in the direction of wishful thinking, and if a diplomat has the feeling that the people at home in Moscow do not want bad news, the temptation to embellish the news is great. The KGB has long had a reputation for reporting things relatively unembellished, and it is, for example, hardly likely that the relevations of corruption among top Polish party officials and the lack of confidence in them among the people came as as much a suprise to Andropov's staff at the KGB as it obvously did to Western communists, who for years allowed themselves to be entertained at fine old palaces. Undoubtedly, he also knows a great deal more about the corruption rife among local party organizations in the Soviet Union than Soviet newspaper readers learn -- and there is really quite a lot of that.

In addition, ever since he left the ambassador's post in Budapest 25 years ago, Andropov has always followed developments in Hungary with special interest. This is now the only country in Eastern Europe where the economic reforms form a basis for the hopes of a better future which the Soviet party laid down as its goal in 1981 -- when Andropov was elected to the Central Committee. Given the food situation in the Soviet Union in particular -- after an agricultural policy so monumentally unsuccessful that there should soon be an outbreak of "de-Brezhnevization" -- there is every reason to look at what the Hungarians have done and perhaps even copy some of it.

This does not mean that Andropov is some sort of liberal. Keeping things under control and using tough and effective methods to do so were his distinguishing mark as KBG chief. They will very probably also be his distinguishing mark as top leader.

The fact that he seems intelligent, competent and effective is not exclusively positive for us in the West when these qualities are found in a person on the other side of the decisive dividing line in world politics. As dangerous as the world is today, however, this is something far preferrable to an unsure leader only just able to rise from his sick bed or a person who knows too little about what is happening around him.

ANDROPOV'S RISE TO POWER, POST-BREZHNEV COURSE

[Per Jonsson editorial: "The Man With the Power in the Kremlin"]

[Text] The Soviet leaders have missed a chance. For years, under an increasingly fragile Brezhnev regime, they could have done what earlier power elites in the history of the Soviet state failed to do: ensure a "normal" regulated succession. That is, not allow power handovers in the country's and the Communist Party's highest office to take place though dethronement (Khrushchev) or death in office -- as in the cases of Lenin, Stalin and now Brezhnev.

Yuriy Andropov's rapid appointment as new party boss could be interpreted to mean that the Politburo had agreed on him in advance as Brezhnev's successor. Against this speaks the fact that Brezhnev's death was kept secret for 24 hours. What was happening during that time among the party's highest leaders? Such self-imposed silence does not give the impression of an agreed order of succession.

There is also a view among Kremlinologists that 68-year-old Andropov has never belonged to the Brezhnev faction within the party. It is tempting to guess that Brezhnev would not approve a crown prince who was not committed to him and to his policies. Andropov fulfills the "minimum qualifications" for the job of party chief -- member of both the Politburo and the Secretariat of the Central Committee -- the only others who do so are agriculture expert Mikhail Gorbachev, who at 51 is too young, and Brezhnev protege Konstantin Chernenko (71). Admission to the Central Committee Secretariat only happened in May this year, and coincided with a whole series of reshuffles within the party elite after the death of ancient chief ideologist Suslov in January.

There are several circumstances which point to the possibility that a tough battle for power in the Kremlin began even before Brezhnev's demise. For many months Brezhnev had given the impression of not being in full control either physically or mentally of the country's and the party's course. Experience teaches that in times of such internal tension, the influence of the security machine on all Soviet policy is strengthened. The fact that the persecution of dissidents has increased in the last 6 months fits the pattern well, as do all the odd suspensions of telecommunications with the rest of the world.

Andropov's 15 years as head of the KGB should under such circumstances have given him a welcome headstart over rivals with better formal qualifications. Perhaps not to the extent that he, with the help of the secret police, forced his way into the post of party leader. But in the general confusion around Brezhnev's deathbed, he could have been the only candidate with a guaranteed reliable power institution to lean on.

If Andropov's elevation did take place in such an atmosphere, it is in line with the Communist Party's tradition from Lenin and Stalin, for the new party chief definitely belongs to the Stalin generation -- as do all his ancient colleagues in the Politburo.

Hopes in the rest of the world that Brezhnev's successor will initiate a new chapter of rethinking in economic and foreign affairs are therefore probably overly hasty. Given the present gerontocracy in the Kremlin it is reasonable to assume that the Stalin system's basic features will be preserved intact: an economy planned by the central bureaucracy, collectivized agriculture, militarized foreign policy and the repression of dissidents. The fact that Andropov has a scant economic background is hardly relevant. The disease of the Soviet system is not primarily economic, but political and moral.

Several sources -- particularly in Eastern Europe and among Russian exiles -- have described Andropov as relatively "liberal" among the Soviet leaders. In many ways this rings false. As Soviet Ambassador in Budapest in 1956, he played an active role in the bloody Soviet invasion of Hungary, and as KGB chief, he shared direct responsibility for the attacks on Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan. It was during his time at the KGB that expulsions and detention in mental hospitals became part of the system; according to some sources, the detente years' increased emigration of Jews was actively opposed and later halted by Andropov.

It is highly likely that under Yuriy Andropov we will witness departures from Leonid Brezhnev's policies in various fields. A certain amount of "de-Brezhnevization" is unavoidable, according to French Kremlinologist Michel Tatu, like "de-Stalinization" and "de-Khrushchevization" in their day. But such maneuvers are never signs of a fundamentally new political course in the Soviet Union. Instead, they confirm that the tradition from Stalin lives on.

THATCHER HAS 'RESTRAINED' STANCE ON EXOCET SALES

[Excerpts] Mrs Thatcher and senior ministers now appear to be taking a restrained attitude to the French decision to resume delivery of Exocet missiles to Argentina. In contrast, Conservative MP Mr Robert Banks yesterday strongly criticised the French action as a "stab in the back."

Mrs Thatcher, on a one-day tour of Cornwall yesterday, offered no direct criticism of the French. She said: "Obviously, we have a big garrison (on the Falklands) and will continue to have a big garrison there. Because we must keep enough people there in ships and in aircraft, both to deter and if necessary to defeat, we will feel deeply hurt if armaments of our allies are used against us." She did not wholly condemn the French over the new Exocet move.

Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym is due to attend a European Council foreign affiars meeting in Brussels on Monday, but the Foreign Office would not say if he planned to raise the issue with his French counterpart. A Foreign Office spokesman said it was for each country to decide its own arms sales policy. There was no indication from Whitehall that Britain was planning to cancel any contracts for the sale of arms to regular customers. Until the Falklands invasion, Britain was a major supplier of arms to Argentina.

NATO'S ROGERS 'SIDESTEPS' QUESTION ON EXOCETS

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Excerpt] NATO's commander in Europe, General Bernard Rogers today side-stepped attempts by a British MP to get him embroiled in the row over the French supply of new Exocet missiles and Super Etendard aircraft to Argentina.

Conservative MP Mr Robert Banks told the North Atlantic Assembly, meeting in London, that the French Government's move was "nothing less than a stab in our back, and action of the highest irresponsibility, and derogation of the moral duty placed on a member of this alliance towards another."

As the French delegation to the meeting of NATO parliamentarians sat impassively just 10 feet from him, the Harrogate MP said "wherever and whenever military conflict occurs there is a risk of an escalation to a wider or indeed a global war." He said it was time NATO banned sales of sophisticated weapons to countries outside the Western alliance. "This action by the French Government, coming at a time when relations between Great Britain and Argentina are suspended, surely deserves to be condemned by all who search for peace." He urged the supreme allied commander in Europe, a United States general: "Will you express your total disappointment at this action?" There was a pause and General Rogers replied: "That is a rhetorical type question. You don't expect an answer from me. Next question."

An Argentine cargo ship, left St Nazaire yesterday with five Super Etendard jets fitted with Exocet missiles and three tons of munitions.

GOVERNMENT DENOUNCES TURKISH MILITARY EXERCISES

NC191921 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 19 Nov 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis has instructed Cyprus' permanent representative at the United Nations to denounce to the internationalorganization's secretary general and to the Security Council's permanent members the holding of military exercises by the invader's occupation troops, something, he stressed, that constitutes a new unacceptable act by Turkey against the Republic of Cyprus.

An official announcement mentions that the miltiary exercises which the occupation troops hold every now and then confirm the cynical stance of the occupying power, which not only refuses to withdraw them from Cyprus soil as repeated resolutions by the UN General Assembly and Security Council dictate, but also engages in provocative displays of military force.

The announcement stresses that the continuing presence of the occupation forces on part of the Republic of Cyprus constitutes a blatant violation of Cyprus' territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty as an equal UN member.

Denktas Claims Self-Defense

TA201607 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the Cyprus problem is not one that can be solved through the force of arms. Denktas replied to questions by a TAK [TURKISH CYPRIOT NEWS AGENCY] correspondent in connection with the Greek Cypriot reaction to the exercises held by the Turkish Cypriot peace forces yesterday. Denktas said: We have no aim other than defending our territory and community on the island. Noting that exercises are being held periodically as a requisite of self-defense, Denktas said that both he and the Turkish Cypriot people were touched by the exercise held yesterday, and that the sacrifices and successes observed at yesterday's exercise were exemplary.

Wishing further success to the soldiers and the Turkish Cypriot security forces, Denktas added: The Turks have never been involved in an armed fight in Cyprus. The Turkish nation and the Turkish Cypriots have been forced to defend their honor, their homeland and themselves for years against armed aggression. This is a historic reality. It cannot be denied. The Cyprus problem can no longer be solved through the use of arms. I believe that the Greek Cypriots, despite all their [words indistinct] and armament, know that they cannot solve the problem through the use of arms. The only reason they attach such importance to armaments is to attract the attention of the world. Let me repeat: We have no aim other than self-defense. Every Turk in Cyprus believes that defending his homeland is a natural right. He will risk everything to defend himself. This has been proven under unfavorable conditions in the past. We hope that the Greek Cypriots will come down to earth, see the realities, realize that they cannot go on (?deceiving) the world, and exert efforts to solve the Cyprus problem within the framework of a bizonal federal partnership.

GOVERNMENT DENIES ALLEGATIONS ON TALKS SLOWDOWN

[Text] The government spokesman has denied an allegation by Mr Denktas that President Kiprianou informed the UN secretary general during their latest meeting that he would not desire a great deal of movement at the intercommunal talks until the [presidential] elections take place, and that this is why the number of meetings within the talks framework has been reduced. The spokesman stressed that the frequency of meetings is dictated by the very nature of the facts.

Answering a question on what the government intends to do about new actions by the Denktas administration to create new faits accomplis, such as the distribution of Greek Cypriot property, the spokesman said the government always proceeds with the appropriate actions at the United Nations and through foreign governments and international organizations.

In answer to another question, the government spokesman said the question of an administration commissioner is being considered by the president of the republic.

Opposition Criticism

[Excerpt] According to information from reliable diplomatic sources, the Greek side has recently made unjustified and inexplicable concessions at the intercommunal talks. Specifically, according to our information, the Greek side has agreed to postpone the discussion of the territorial issue which, as all the parties admit, constitutes the most substantive aspect of the problem.

With the Greek side's consent, the territorial issue has been put aside for 4 or 5 months, that is, until March or April 1983. According to the same source, the Famagusta issue has also been abandoned even though it should be given priority on the basis of the Waldheim proposals.

In light of all this, according to the same sources, the intercommunal talks will be conducted without any substantive content, but merely for the sake of continuity.

However, even though the talks have reached a complete deadlock because the two sides are not in a position to discuss the topics on the agenda, neither side is prepared to leave the negotiating table first.

According to the same sources, this is the framework within which President Kiprianou's decision to ask for a deceleration of the dialogue should also be placed. These sources say that Mr Kiprianou knows that the basic issues cannot be discussed before the presidential elections, but that he does not have the courage to terminate the dialogue.

Further Government Denials

[Text] Replying to a report published in today's newspapers that the Greek Cypriot side recently made unjustified and inexplicable concessions at the intercommunal negotiations table, the government spokesman stated that this allegation is totally unfounded and that absolutely no concessions have been made by the Greek Cypriot side either recently or in the past.

The spokesman also described as baseless an allegation included in the same press report that the Greek Cypriot side abandoned the territorial issue which, according to the press report, would be discussed in 4 or 5 months. The territorial aspect, the government spokesman added, will be discussed at the next meeting of the interlocutors on Thursday.

In reference to the priority of the Famagusta issue, the spokesman said that it has in no way been abandoned. The Greek Cypriot side, he added, continues to consider the issue as one of the highest priority.

KIPRIANOU, DUTCH ENVOY DISCUSS ISLAND'S DIVISION

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou reiterated the need for the implementation of UN resolutions on Cyprus and asked for the withdrawal of the occupation troops. Receiving the credentials of the new Netherlands ambassador to Cyprus, Baron Seger van Voorst tot Voorst today, President Kiprianou said Turkey has not abandoned the philosophy of division which, he stressed, it is implementing through various illegal measures in the occupied territory.

We seek, the president of the republic mentioned, a peaceful solution for the problem so Cyprus can become a happy and prosperous country for all its inhabitants, provided foreign interventions and violations end and conditions for the unity of the people and the country are guaranteed. President Kiprianou stressed that we shall continue our struggle and that sooner or later we shall achieve our goals.

Referring to relations between Cyprus and the Netherlands, he said they are developing satisfactorily and that there are opportunities for further improvement.

Handing over his credentials, the new Netherlands ambassador gave assurances that he will make every effort to promote good relations between the two countries.

DENKTAS SCORES GOBBI REMARK ON UN TROOPS

NC220841 Nicosia HALKIN SESI in Turkish 19 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Head of State Denktas described as strange the suggestion to replace the Turkish troops, who safe guarded the Turkish Cypriot community's security only at the last moment, with United Nations troops. Head of state Denktas, commenting on the reaction by the Greek Cypriot administration to UN special envoy in Cyprus Hugo Gobbi's TV statement, stressed that it was not up to us to assess what Gobbi had said. Denktas added: "To say that UN troops would provide the security which the Turkish troops are providing would amount to making fun of us."

Recalling that although there were 7,000 UN troops on the island during the years 1963, 1964 and 1967 to protect us, our security was completely shaken, our fellow countrymen were killed, our homes and villages were plundered and our rights were usurped. Denktas added: "Offering us UN troops even after these experiences and saying that these troops could provide us with the security which Turkish troops have been providing amounts to ridiculing us."

DENKTAS CRITICIZES GREEK CYPRIOT APPROACH ON UN

[Text] President Denktas has described the taking of the Cyprus problem to the nonaligned summit and then to the UN General Assembly as contrary to the efforts of the UN secretary general for success at the Cyprus intercommunal talks. The president was replying to a question on Mr Kiprianou's invitation to Cyprus of the nonaligned contact group. President Denktas described the invitation as entirely intended to formulating a pro-Greek Cypriot resolution to be taken to the Delhi nonaligned summit. He expressed the hope that the nonaligned contact group would decline this invitation because it would cause more damage than benefit to the Cyprus problem. President Denktas said that this Turkish Cypriot view will be communicated to the governments of the countries in the nonaligned contact group.

Replying to another question on the appointment of a new Greek Cypriot high commissioner to Canada, and the allegations made in the credentials handed to the Canadian Government, President Denktas said that no new high commissioner for Cyprus had been appointed to Canada. The man said to be appointed was representing only the Greek Cypriot administration and should be viewed as such. The president recalled that Canada had sent about 25,000 soldiers to Cyprus within the framework of the UN peace-keeping forces since 1964 and Canada should be one of the countries who knew the details of the Cyprus problem better than others. President Denktas said that the acceptance by Canada of this Greek Cypriot official as representing Cyprus was regrettable.

But, he added, we hope and believe that the Canadian Government will treat him as someone who represented only the Greek Cypriot community and as having no authority to speak for the Turkish Cypriot community.

On the allegation that a solution of the Cyprus problem was not possible unless Turkey's aims to partition Cyprus were given up, President Denktas said that the present separation between the two communities in Cyprus was the result of the Greek Cypriot efforts to destroy the bicommunal government of Cyprus. He stressed that attempts to describe the separation created through Greek Cypriot attacks against the Turkish Cypriot community as efforts by Turkey to partition the islands were wrong. He said that Turkey had made sacrifices to save the independence of Cyprus which was based on the two communities. President Denktas reiterated that the Turkish peace force in Cyprus was the guarantee of the security of the Turkish Cypriot community in Cyprus and would not leave the island until a concrete agreemetn safeguarding the security of the community was reached. He added that it was unavoidable that Turkish military presence in Cyprus was necessary as part of her guarantorship. He stressed that the Turkish Cypriot community did not believe the independence of Cyprus could continue without Turkey's guarantee.

President Denktas recalled that the Turkish Cypriot community was not a party to the UN resolutions on Cyprus. He stressed that a solution to the Cyprus problem could not be found through resolutions to which the Turkish Cypriots were not a party, because these resolutions had been adopted after hearing only the Greek Cypriot community. He said that this was known by the Greek Cypriot leadership because the matter had been discussed at length during the summit meetings and the framework for a solution to the Cyprus problem had been determined. President Denktas also pointed out that the UN resolutions on the displaced persons had been also changed after an agreement on the exchange of population had been reached between the two communities. The president concluded by saying that all these facts should be kept in mind while examining the Cyprus problem.

HURRIYET: NEW SPY STATION 'WATCHING AMERICANS'

[Text] Lefkosa (Nicosia), (HURRIYET) -- The Greek Cypriot sector has in recent weeks become the scene of intensive activities which endanger the security of the eastern Mediterranean. Western officials in the Greek Cypriot sector are talking of a newly established secret "spying station." Reports say that this station, which is equipped with modern electronic apparatuses and which has gone into action in southeast Cyprus, is watching all the activities of the Americans in the region.

Parallel to these activities, the "advisors" and "attaches" attached to the diplomatic missions of the Eastern bloc in the Greek Cypriot sector have abnormally increased. The excessive number of Bulgarian "technicians" in the Greek Cypirot sector attracts special attention. Foreign observers say that there are Bulgarian "experts" in the Greek Cypriot Army, which is continually being reinforced.

Hungarian products of equal value will be imported by Cyprus in accordance with the agreement, which was concluded by Andonis Dh. Khatzipavlou, director of the Cyprus Wines Corporation, on behalf of 11 Cypriot firms. [Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 20 Nov 82 pp 1, 7 NC]

PROTEST OUTSIDE U.S. BASE SCHEDULED FOR 24 NOV

[Excerpt] "The Ellinikon base and all the other death bases which shackle our national independence must be removed from our country." This was stressed yesterday by the mayor of Ellinikon, Mr K. Kortzidhis, at a meeting on the issue of the bases that was jointly organized by the Ellinikon and Glifadha municipalities, together with the peace committees in the two areas, at the Ellinikon town hall. It was also stressed that the municipalities in the eastern and southern areas should mobilize for the abolition of the bases. At the same time, the need to coordinate the mobilization of these municipalities was emphasized. As a first step, the Ellinikon mayor proposed that the organizations represented at the meeting participate in the gathering to be held outside the Ellinikon base on Wednesday, 24 November, being organized by the Ellinikon municipality and the local peace committee. He also proposed that a coordinating committee be elected from among those present.

The meeting was also attended by Deputies T. Mavrodhoglou and Stathis Panagoulis, and Glifadha Mayor Spondhilidhis.

PAPANDREOU ADDRESSES MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING

NC200636 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 19 Nov 82

[Text] In no way should the [PASOK] movement intervene in government affairs except through the Central Committee and the Executive Bureau. This was stressed by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou to the Ministerial Council which convened this evening under his chairmanship and dealt with issues of domestic and foreign policy.

In no way, the prime minister stressed, should cadres or PASOK members interfere with ministers, nomarchs or administrators of organizations or banks and so forth to propose either transfers or hirings or any other administrative act, because such action interferes with our mission, undermines popular national unity and undermines the government's task, especially now when we are facing so many problems. Finally, it undermines the very course to socialism. For this reason, I order that henceforth no such activity be allowed, and at the same time, I hold all members of the Ministerial Council responsible for briefing the organizations they control. All of us, Papandreou continued, should do everything we can to avoid polarization and to offer all our forces for the defusing of any form of polarization, which can create obstacles to our course. Let it be noted that I do not intend to repeat what we have said. This is not wishful thinking — it is a decision.

Then the prime minister pointed out that perhaps a slight difference in tone between the government message and that of the PASOK movement on the Polytechnic anniversary had been noted. I want to stress, he said, that this difference exists and is intentional. The movement is obligated to always stress our strategic goals to the Greek people. The movement constitutes he conscience of all of us. The government has a duty to execute tactical maneuvers, to proceed with specific steps in the face of reality. In the year that has passed, Papandreou then said, important institutional changes have been made, and the promulgation of new institutional laws will continue so that the people's expectations and the Greek vision of a decentralized, democratic socialism may be realized through the construction of tomorrow's society.

The experiment that is taking place at this moment in our country is causing great interest abroad, too, and its uniqueness is being recognized in that it invloves a peaceful democratic transfer to socialism based on the active participation of the people. Its success will be an achievement of historic significance. Later in his speech to the Ministerial Council, the prime minister said the foreign and defense policies the government has charted constitute a new road, the road to a substantive, multidimensional foreign policy.

The important issue of the U.S. bases is proceeding satisfactorily from the Greek point of view, and reasonable time will be devoted to the conclusion of the negotiations. The submission of the 1983 budget in a few days is a true milestone, the second budget of the government of change. In 1982 we were able to enact a very dynamic incomes policy for low-income people and those on small pensions in villages and towns. The year 1982 can be described as a year of economic justice and economic stabilization. Our goals for 1983 are the rebuilding and revitalization of the economy through investments, public and private, so that productivity may increase and unemployment, which hits mainly young people and women, may be reduced.

Greece has its own voice in Europe and actively participates in the treatment of international problems, in the struggles for detente and disarmament, while promoting the issue of a missile-free zone in the Balkans which, if achieved, will have huge repercussions on both East and West. The statement which was made on the night of 18 October 1981 that we shall be a government of all Greeks constitutes the expression of a basic decision for national popular unity. In view of the crisis which exists in both East and West, the prime minister stressed, we have done comparatively well so far, but we shall do even better. As the prime minister stressed, the movement's congress will be held in 1983 and from it will result a new Central Committee and a new executive bureau. We shall return to our sources, he stressed, to be repurified and to continue the course.

At the beginning of the Ministerial Council meeting, Papandreou briefed the members on his recent trip to Moscow and the contacts he had had there with Soviet Premier Tikhonov and UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar. In addition, yesterday morning the Prime Minister briefed President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis on his trip.

JARUZELSKI PRAISES ROLE OF GREEKS IN POLAND

[By RIZOSPASTIS correspondent Dhim. Konstandopoulos]

[Text] Warsaw -- In a personally handwritten letter to the conference of Greek Communists in Poland, which was held in view of the 11th KKE Congress, Comrade Jaruzelski said: "I have received the letter you sent me on the occasion of the party conference of Greek Communists living in Poland.

"I express my warm thanks for your greetings and wishes. We highly appreciate your participation in the problems of Poland which, as you mentioned, you regard as your second homeland. [Text] Dear comrade: On the occasion of your election to the post of CPSU Central Committee general secretary, the Central Committee of the Greek Communist Party sends warmest cordial congratulations on behalf of the party's members and supporters and of the working and progressive people of our country. The Greek Communists see in you the capable successor for continuing -- from the post of head of the Leninist Central Committee of the glorious CPSU -- the great contribution of L.I. We express the belief that the close brotherly relations between our parties -- relations based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and of proletarian internationalism -- will be strengthened in the interest of our two peoples, of peace and of the world. Dear Comrade Andropov, we wish you further successes in building the communist society in the Soviet Union in the cause of peace, social progress and socialism.

EVREN CALLS FOR TOLERANCE IM SAMSUN ADDRESS

[Excerpts] President Kenan Evren has said that Turkey has entered the period of transition to a parliamentary democratic system. He added: The period of fighting has ended and the period of brotherhood has begun.

Speaking in Samsun, Evren said that if the citizens view one another as enemies and show contempt for those with different views, as was the case before the 12 September operation, the much desired real democratic system cannot be established. Evren went to Samsun for a visit. National Security Council members -- Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya and Naval Forces Commander Adm Nejat Tumer -- and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu accompanied him.

In his speech, Evren said: If, during the period of transition to a democratic parliamentary system, we view one another as enemies, if we show contempt for those who do not share our views, we cannot establish the real democratic system we do desire. A person might not share our views. We will be tolerant. The period of enmity has ended. A period of brotherhood has begun. We will consider one another as brothers. We are the children of the same nation, we share the same homeland. We have to treat one another as brothers. We will not forget the past days. I expressed this view earlier. We will not forget those bitter days. However, neither will we speak about them unless forced to. We are beginning to erase that period. A new period has begun. I wish you, all my citizens, happiness in this new period.

After concluding his speech, Evren visited various installations. Evren will spend the night in Samsun and visit Fatsa and Ordu tomorrow. He is expected to address the public in Fatsa and Ordu. Evren, the National Security Council members and the prime minister will return to Ankara tomorrow.

Continues Speaking Tour

[Excerpts] President Kenan Evren has said that the Yes votes cast during the public referendum were not meant for him or the other members of the National Security Council but for the restoration of peace, tranquillity, Ataturkism and brotherhood in the country. President Evren left Samsun today by land for Ordu. On his way to Ordu, the president briefly addressed the people in districts such as Carsamba, Unye, Fatsa and Persembe. People in those districts met President Evren with great ovations. The president thanked the citizens for their expressions of warm interest and stopped to speak with some of them.

After the District of Unye, the president addressed the people in Fatsa: [Begin Evren recording] My dear citizens of Fatsa, I know you are hurt because we did not visit your district earlier. You are right. However, we have waited for peace and order to be restored so that we could visit you. In July 1980, we overflew your district by helicopter in flying to Ordu to be briefed by the governor and could not make it here. At that time, there was not much to be done if we had come to your district.

I am sure that you have not forgotten what happened in your district. There were many districts in Turkey which were proclaimed "liberated areas." Fatsa in the Black Sea region was one of these, Hilvan, Siverek in southeast Anatolia, Turgutlu in the Aegean region and others. In these regions, state authority was nonexistent. The power vacuum was filled by other forces which ruled these areas.

They claimed that the citizens of Fatsa were satisfied with the new order imposed by the mayor. Now, I am asking these people, if the citizens of Fatsa were so happy with that kind of rule, why then did these same citizens support the new Constitution by a vote of 96 percent. expressing their confidence in the new administration? We are waiting for a reply to this question.

Dear citizens of Fatsa, wherever our people suffered most from anarchy and violence, we have received the highest rate of support in the referendum vote. These towns and cities supported us with a proportion of over 95 percent. This result has firmly demonstrated that our citizens do not favor anarchy and violence. They are looking for peace and tranquillity. This is the significance of the referendum vote. We have never considered these votes as being cast for us personally. These votes were cast for our people. We should be proud of this. In God's name, let such days of turbulence never return. [end recording]

From Fatsa, the president visited Ordu's Persembe District and addressed the people there and thanked them for their welcome. Later, President Evren arrived in the city of Ordu and made the following speech to the people assembled in the municipality park square.

[Begin Evren recording] My dear citizens of Ordu. I thank you all for coming here to listen to me despite this heavy rain. Despite my wish to visit you during my tour in the eve of the referendum vote, I was unable to do so. However, I choose Ordu as my first stop as soon as I was elected president.

I also promise to visit Giresun and Sinop. We all know what the city of Ordu as well as its district Fatsa went through prior to 12 September 1980. When the armed forces commanders and I visited your city in July 1980, we were saddened by the information we received from the officials; a terrible situation existed then. We were obliged to bring reinforcements from Sarikamis in order to help out with the situation. A battalion had to be brought here from a far-away place like Sarikamis to restore public order. Even this measure did not help, as state authority had disappeared completely.

Dear citizens, the results of the recent referendum have proved that an overwhelming majority of the people -- 91.5 percent -- have voted yes. What does this signify? Dear citizens, these votes were not meant for us, or for General Evren, or the members of the National Security Council. These votes were cast infavor of peace and tranquillity so that the state authority and Ataturkism could be restored. The people want a policy in line with the Ataturk principles. These votes were also meant to show the people's dislike for those who were daily occupied with fighting each other, accusing each other and refusing even to greet each other. The people want brotherhood and peace, not quarrels.

We still have many difficulties to surmount and there are hard days ahead. However, our people, the Turkish people, will know how to surmount these hardships as they have done in the past. No difficulties can stand in front of brotherly solidarity. That is why I have called, in my Samsun speech, for an end to the past and for a period of brotherhood, unity and solidarity to begin. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT GIVES FINAL REFERENDUM RESULTS

[Text] The final official results of the constitutional referendum held on 7 November have been announced. The High Election Council decision on the results was published in the Official Gazette today. It says that a statement issued by the council on 9 November said that the results from 730 ballot polls had not been received due to poor weather but that they would not affect the approval of the Constitution.

Today's announcement says that the rate of participation in the referendum was 91.27 percent. The number of valid votes was 18,841,990, of which 17,215,559 were positive votes while 1,626,431 were negative votes. In other words, the Constitution was approved with 91.37 percent of the vote.

DEFENSE MINISTER BAYULKEN ON AIRFIELDS, RDF

[Text] Ankara, (HURRIYET) -- In the course of the National Defense Ministry budget debate in the Consultative Assembly, Aydin Tug and Tevfik Fikret Alpaslan said Turkey should not undertake any mission outside NATO borders and in places which do not come under NATO's responsibility.

Addressing the assembly, National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken said military aid donated to Turkey by the United States has been suspended since 1974 and added: "Free military aid is currently being received from Federal Germany in the form of units [birim]."

Referring to the Rapid Deployment Force (RDF), Bayulken said: "Whatever is to be done, even if it is for NATO, will have to be nationally approved." Stating that NATO countries could undertake certain activities outside NATO for their own national interests, Bayulken added that NATO has taken no decision regarding the RDF. Bayulken continued: "NATO is studying this issue. Since it is a defense past and as worldwide arming continues, it is normal that this should be studied. NATO is not only studying the sensitive situation in the Middle East. It is also watching all international developments. NATO has not assigned any task to us in connection with the RDF. Even if it does, every member has an independent vote. Where did this originate? As you know, there is the question of modernizing some of our airfields. Our airfields have been constructed by NATO ever since we have joined it. We undertake one percent of the basic requirements. Now they are being modernized. It should be clearly known that the policy of the Turkish Republic is determined in Ankara by Turkish national authorities. Is it known how many airfields exist in Turkey? An assessment should be made only after this is taken into consideration. It is a fact that Turkey is cooperating with all the Islamic countries in every field. Naturally, this is done in the military field too. But it would be inappropriate to seek military aims just because a training agreement is concluded. It has no relation to the pact. Cooperation is carried out so that we may be able to sell our defense industry products. Is it not a sad situation because, influenced by some statements and the views expressed by some journalists, no pressure is exercised on Turkey to assume some responsibility in the Gulf? Is there not a saddening aspect in this? There is no change whatsoever in Turkey's Middle East policy. With its strong armed forces, Turkey, as a member of NATO, will continue to be an element of equilibrium in the Middle East."

Begins Contacts

[Text] FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher held contacts in Ankara today with President Evren receiving him at Cankaya Mansion at 0900. According to the presidential press and public relations office, the FRG foreign minister congratulated President Evren on behalf of his government for having been elected president. During the meeting, they discussed the further development of the cooperation between the two countries. They also reviewed Turkey's relations with the EEC and with the FRG. Foreign Minister Turkmen was also present at the meeting.

The visiting minister then met with Prime Minister Ulusu, who said in a speech that such meetings were helpful in promoting the relations between the two countries.

Genscher said that during his visit he would hold an exchange of views on all issues concerning the two countries. He noted that there were certain problems causing some difficulties between the two countries, adding that during the talks they would discuss these issues frankly. Genscher pointed out that the FRG was following developments in Turkey closely and that this followed from the traditional friendship between the two countries.

The FRG foreign minister then met Foreign Minister Turkmen. The two ministers will have lunch together, and Genscher will leave Turkey this afternoon.

Favors Renewed Support

LD201630 Hamburg DPA in German 1526 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Text] Ankara, 20 Nov (DPA) — During his working visit to Ankara, FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has spoken in favor of further support for Turkey and the development of relations between the NATO country and the EEC. Diplomatic circles say that the 12-hour visit of the foreign minister has smoothed the way for a positive report on Turkey.

This report, which is to be presented first to the government next Wednesday and then to the Bundestag, is to be the basis for discussing the granting of frozen aid money for Turkey. The FRG had made the DM 400-million aid dependent on the return by Turkey — which is governed by the military — to democracy. According to diplomats, Genscher sees the new Constitution adopted 2 weeks ago by referendum as the first step and a "good start" toward democratization.

In the words of the foreign minister, those he spoke to in Turkey — Head of State Kenan Evren and Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen — had shown understanding for the problem of foreigners in the FRG. Genscher stressed that the freedom of movement for Turkish workers agreed upon in the treaty of association between the EEC and Turkey from 1986 would also be dependent on economic circumstances.

The application of relevant agreements should not "in the view of both sides" have any detrimental effects. This means, diplomats say, that the Turkish Government will refrain from applying the freedom of movement clauses from 1986 in full.

There will be talks between the FRG and Turkey on financial incentives -- such as the repayment of social security contributions -- to those workers who voluntarily want to leave the FRG. Genscher stressed that no Turkish worker would be forced to leave against his will. "Turkish citizens in the FRG enjoy esteem as fellow citizens and coworkers," he said.

Genscher Concludes Visit

[Text] FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has said that from now on his country will exert its weight in ameliorating relations between Turkey and the EEC.

Genscher, who arrived in Ankara last night, concluded his contacts and left Turkey this afternoon. Genscher held a news conference with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at Esenboga Airport and reported on his 12-hour Ankara visit. Genscher said that he held long and comprehensive contacts with President Kenan Evren, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and Foreign Minister Turkmen on issues concerning the two countries. He said that he was briefed by Evren on the referendum, the new Constitution and on the steps to be taken to reestablish parliamentary democracy in Turkey. Noting that a unity of views has been reached during his contacts in Ankara concerning the development of partnership relations between Turkey and the EEC in line with the essence of the new Constitution, Genscher added that the situation of the Turks living in the FRG was also discussed in detail. He noted that it is out of the question to send back the Turks in the FRG against their will. He said that the social security rights of Turkish citizens who wish to return to Turkey will be protected by FRG social security organizations. Stating that the free circulation of Turkish citizens in EEC countries as stipulated by the Turkish-EEC partnership agreement was also discussed, Genscher added that a unity of views was also reached on eliminating the [word indistinct] in connection with the implementation of the free circulation clause.

Recalling the joint communique issued in connection with Chancellor Kohl's visit to the United States, Genscher pointed out that the necessity for improving the Turkish economy was included in the communique. He added that in decisions concerning economic relations between the FRG and Turkey, this view will be taken into consideration.

Genscher said that his contacts in Ankara were held in an atmosphere in line with the NATO cooperation spirit, EEC partnership and the traditional friendship between the two countries. Genscher said that he invited Turkmen to visit the FRG in the first months of next year, and that his invitation was accepted. In reply to a question, Genscher said that recent developments in Turkey will be included in detail in the report to be submitted by his government to the Parliament.

Meets Evren, Ulusu

[Text] Indonesian Public Works Minister Hajisaroso Purnomosidi, who arrived in Ankara yesterday, has completed his contacts. This morning he held a meeting with Public Works Minister Tahsin Onalp.

Onalp said in a speech: [Begin recording] Dr Hajisoroso visited our country about 1 year ago. In light of the talks we held at that time, I had the honor of visiting Indonesia as the guest of the honorable minister from 1-12 March 1982. I thus had the opportunity of seeing Indonesia, with a population of 150 million, spread over 13,500 islands with a total surface of 1.5 million square kilometres. It is a dynamic country with great possibilities and a country of the future. I believe that the two countries have common problems. Turkey is a bridge between Europe and Asia, and the country of our honorable guest is a bridge between Asia and Australia. We believe that it would be very useful for these two dynamic countries with common problems to cooperate, especially in the industrial sector -- which we believe will play the most important role in their development -- and in economic development. The first fruit of this understanding has been the framework agreement Turkish and Indonesian [word indistinct] signed at the end of my visit there. [end recording]

The Indonesian public works minister expressed his pleasure at visiting Turkey for the second time. He expressed the belief that concrete results would be obtained from this visit.

The visiting minister was received by President Kenan Evren at Cankaya Mansion at 1400. The minister presented a written message from Indonesian President Suharto to President Evren. In his message, President Suharto expressed his pleasure at the prospect of seeing President Evren in Indonesia next month, and also expressed his best wishes for relations between the two countries.

The Indonesian public works minister was received by Prime Minister Ulusu at 1500. He then visited Foreign Minister Turkmen. Public Works Minister Onalp attended all the meetings.

The visiting minister and his delegation held a meeting at 1600 with contractors of the Turkish construction and installations contractors union. Cooperation in the private sectors of the two countries in the field of construction was discussed at the meeting. The Indonesian minister will leave Turkey tomorrow.

PARTY LEADER SENTENCED BY MILITARY COURT

[Text] Ankara, Nov 17 (AFP) -- A former leader of the Turkish Worker-Peasant Party (TIKP), Dogu Perincek, was sentenced by an Istanbul military court today to one year in prison for endangering state security, sources here said. The charge stemmed from the publication of an article in the party's paper AYDINLIK, in July 1978, which identified members of a special counterinsurgency force within the Turkish police.

Mr Perincek was released from prison last July with two other TIKP leaders after serving one year on charges of offending the government and spreading communist propaganda. He is scheduled to appear in court today with AYDINLIK's director of publications to answer for a book published before the September 1980 military coup denouncing an extreme right movement, the "Grey Wolves."

The same Istanbul military court today also ordered more information in the case of Burhan Apaysin, lawyer for the 27 leaders of the Turkish Peace Committee imprisoned since February. He has been accused of insulting magistrature for writing a letter to military leaders charging that arrest warrants for the 27 had been issued by biased judges.

KREISKY: NO AUSTRIA LINK IN TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

[Kurt Seinitz dispatch from the United States: "Kreisky Indignantly Refutes Assertions of a U.S. Official: U.S. Technical Equipment Smuggled to the USSR via Austria"]

[Text] Washington -- Despite the stormy "thaw" between Vienna and Washington and the "invasion of red-white-red [Austrian flag] politicians" in the United States, the problems between the present U.S. Administration and the Federal Government in Vienna are still far from being completely eliminated. On the contrary, U.S. Assistant Secretary of Defense (international security policy) Richard Perle has now opened an entirely new front in an interview with KRONEN ZEITUNG.

For the first time, Assistant Secretary Perle quite openly expressed the great anxiety of the U.S. Administration concerning the flourishing transfer of the latest technology from the West via Austria to the Soviet Union, while President Reagan is imposing his embargoes and boycotts, and while, particularly now, important negotiations about a joint position on restricting technology exports to the Soviet Union are taking place within NATO and with Japan. Assistant Secretary Perle: "The past transfer of technology to the East has evidently helped the Soviet Union in the rapid development of new weapons systems!"

In connection with Austria's neutrality policy, Assistant Secretary Perle has now told KRONEN ZEITUNG that Austria's security depends less on whether the State Treaty permits the Austrian Army to be equipped with missiles or whether the clause in the State Treaty prohibiting missiles should be altered, but on the fact that Austria's security is first and foremost based on a balanced equilibrium of forces in NATO and the Eastern bloc. So long as NATO is in a position to counter Soviet armaments, Austria's security is also guaranteed.

Following that, the prominent representative of the Reagan administration became very specific: "There now exists an important question in respect to which Austria could also make an important contribution to its own security and to that of the West, that is, by restricting Western technology exports to the Soviet Union. The trade policy of neutral Austria differs tremendously in this respect from that of the Western community. If I were to decide what was more important for Austria's security -- a few missiles for the Federal Army or better control of technology transfers -- I would not hesitate to pick the second alternative." Assistant Secretary Perle concluded his stiff criticism of Austria's East-West policy.

The Reagan administration's anxiety about the notorious "transfer center Vienna" is also expressed in the latest studies of the CIA, the U.S. intelligence service, in which the Soviet Union is charged with smuggling computer parts and other products important for the arms industry from the United States to Vienna, thereby bypassing the U.S. technology emargo, and then having goods legally exported by front companies to the Soviet Union as Austria's neutrality policy has no trade restrictions.

In an initial comment, Chancellor Kreisky told KRONEN ZEITUNG yesterday, "it is not true that Vienna is a transfer center for smuggling Western technology to the Soviet Union. If the U.S. assistant defense secretary wants to prescribe what we shall export to the East, this is impermissible interference in Austrian domestic affairs." The government head also affirmed that Austria would never bow to such an American demand. He also requested that the U.S. assistant defense secretary supply evidence for his assertions.

LUBBERS VIEWS NATO SPENDING, MISSILE DEPLOYMENT

[Text] The Hague, Nov 22 (AFP) -- The Netherlands will fulfill its nuclear commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and increase real defense spending by two percent annually during the next four years, Dutch Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers said here today.

In his speech at the swearing in ceremony of his government, Mr Lubbers called the Atlantic alliance the key to Western cooperation and promised that the Netherlands will continue efforts to diminish reliance on nuclear arms.

The new prime minister said that the Netherlands will continue preparations to deploy NATO missiles to pressure the Soviet Union to negotiate a reduction of nuclear weapons at Geneva.

Mr Lubbers said that parliament would debate the missile deployment preparations and that the Soviet attitude at the Geneva negotiations could influence the Dutch position on the deployment of cruise missiles.

The prime minister also voiced his government's support for free trade, the admittance of Spain and Portugal to the European Common Market, and the strengthening of the European monetary system.

The prime minister said that the Netherlands will maintain its aid to developing countries at the present level of 1.5 percent of gross national product.

DE VOLKSKRANT COMMENTS ON U.S. SANCTIONS LIFTING

PM221657 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 15 Nov 82 p 3

[Editorial: "A Little Step Backwards"]

[Text] Good news from Washington: On Saturday President Reagan put an end to the ban -- announced 11 months ago and tightened in June this year -- on the supply of U.S. equipment for the natural gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe. This means the end of part of the U.S. embargo policy against Moscow which annoyed the European allies from the very beginning and which became completely indigestible when Washington appeared to be well prepared to give further grain supplies to the Soviet Union.

In his announcement, Reagan put great emphasis on the fact that the United States and its Western allies have now reached agreement on a joint trade strategy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union in which political and military interests will be taken into consideration to a greater extent than in the past. France has already made trouble by stating in an official reaction that it has no part in such an agreement. But even despite this, the Western agreement announced by Reagan is not much more than a glorified fig leaf. In principle, Western trade with the Eastern bloc is already being "checked" by COCOM [Coordinating Committee for Export to Communist Areas] and there can be no objections to intensifying consultations within that nonbinding organ. In addition, the points on which the joint trade strategy are to be shaped are phrased so cautiously or in such general terms that they cannot be described as a substantial tightening of the norms which would take a disproportionately heavy economic toll on the West European nations.

More important than these tactical flanking movements is the fact that Washington has removed a major bone of contention in its relations with its allies. This is chiefly a success for Secretary of State Shultz. With patient consultations, he has succeeded in altering a policy -- with a clear address to the domestic audience -- which his predecessor Alexander Haig was unable to prevent.

The suspension of the U.S. embargo against the Siberian gas pipeline also came at a very convenient time, that is, at the same time as the accession to power of a new leader in the Kremlin. Even the assurance from U.S. officials that this was a coincidence cannot obscure the fact that this little U.S. step backwards from an ill-thought-out confrontation course has the character of a small good-will gesture addressed to Brezhnev's successor. The fact that the suspension of the sanctions regulations comes on the eve of the first visit by West German Federal Chancellor Kohl to Washington, and therefore also serves as a pleasant windfall for the successor to Schmidt, the troublesome ally, must be seen as an extra bonus.

GENSCHER WELCOMES REAGAN TRUST-BUILDING MEASURES

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today welcomed U.S. President Ronald Reagan's proposals for trust-building measures between East and West. This initiative "corresponds with the view of the Federal Government that the attempt must be made by way of concrete agreements to improve the transparency of military potentials and activities in East-West relations and on a worldwide basis," Genscher said in a Foreign Ministry statement.

CDU/CSU Welcome Measures

[Text] Bonn 23 Nov (DPA) -- The Union parties in Bonn have welcomed U.S. president Ronald Reagan's offer to Moscow to create confidence-building measures in the military sphere. Referring to the President's television address broadcast a little earlier, CDU/CSU disarmament expert Juergen Todenhoefer told DPA last night that the CDU/CSU welcomed the U.S. President's offer to the Soviet Union of "agreeing to an increased extent regarding confidence-building measures in the military sector."

In Todenhoefer's view, this offer impressively stresses the defensive strategy and will for peace of the United States and NATO. Building confidence by creating greater military transparency in East and West is one of the major prerequisites for disarmament. The U.S. readiness to agree on confidence-building measures with the Soviet Union even before the conclusion of the START and INF talks is thus of great significance. The Union's disarmament expert added that the CDU/CSU hopes that the new Soviet leadership will respond positively to President Reagan's proposals.

The CDU/CSU also called on the Social Democrats "in the interests of our country" to support NATO's disarmament strategy. The SPD must stop "pulling apart piece by piece" individual arms control proposals made by the alliance and "sowing doubts as to the U.S. readiness to disarm." Todenhoefer said in conclusion that "it would be irresponsible if the West, through internal dispute, were to reduce the chances for firmly established, balanced and verifiable disarmament agreements."

DER SPIEGEL REPORTS ON RDF, U.S. MANEUVERS

DW221053 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 22 Nov 82 p 15

[Text] In mid-November, 3,000 U.S. soldiers practiced coastal landings in conjunction with Moroccan troops. Some 2,500 U.S. soldiers are to take part in maneuvers in Oman, Somalia and Sudan in December; the United States is preparing large-scale exercises in the Middle East for next summer. The United States is strengthening its military presence in the Mediterranean area and in Asia Minor. The objective is to provide bases for the "Rapid Deployment Force" which is primarily equipped for crisis missions in the Gulf. As an indication of initial successes, $91 million is being spent to improve a base in Egypt, and in Oman the Americans are spending $280 million to make ready four airfields. Following the announcement by the socialist government in Athens concerning limiting the use of Greek bases, the United States has come to terms with Turkey. Washington and Ankara have now agreed to modernize two bases in the East and to build an airbase.

CHANCELLOR KOHL ON FOREIGN, DOMESTIC ISSUES

DW221029 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1915 GMT 18 Nov 82

[Interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl by Theo Sommer of DIE ZEIT, Joachim Sobotta of the RHEINISCHE POST and Hans-Joachim Deckert of the MANNHEIMER MORGEN in the "Television Discussion" program moderated by Rudolf Muehlfenzl; recorded in Bonn on 17 November]

[Excerpt] [Muehlfenzl] Mr Chancellor, U.S. Government quarters had said at the end of last week that while the government change did not greatly alter the problems in German-American relations, there was a new basic mood -- this was the word used, I think. The NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG writes today that as a result of your visit, there has been a noticeable change of mood and feelings. How do you assess the mood following your visit?

[Answer] Well, Mr Muehlfenzl, it is hard for someone with a major role to make an assessment as you did. Using my former visits, which were always made as the opposition leader, as a comparison, I found the climate to be remarkably friendly indeed. A very personal and very cordial atmosphere prevailed in all talks with the U.S. President. If I interpret matters correctly, it is quite evident that in the present international situation, the Americans view us in a very special way, which is quite natural. It is also evident that they want to know exactly what we are thinking about individual problems and that they have gratefully accepted my maxim that it is important for equal partners and friends who wish to maintain their friendship to talk with, rather than about each other. This was the way in which we proceeded. All I can say is that I am very grateful for the excellent program that we were able to follow there and for the many discussions on possibilities of exchanging views, not only with respect to topical problems, but also regarding basic problems of German policy.

At this point, may I be allowed to stress to the German people that I held a long talk with the President about the problem of the partition our our fatherland, and about how this problem affects the young generation in the FRG, about what young people in the GDR are thinking -- to the extent that I am able to assess this and provide information about it -- and about how the developments in Poland are reflected in our country. These are all topics which cannot be dealt with or settled immediately, but which permanently remain on the agenda and which are important for the assessment of the problems affecting our country.

[Sommer] Mr Chancellor, the atmosphere was also friendlier because the President had lifted the trade sanctions the day before your visit -- sanctions which had hit some European companies quite hard. It isn't quite clear whether this was the unilateral lifting of a unilateral U.S. measure -- the French president said that there was no agreement, Mrs Thatcher says that there were no new stipulations. What commitments have we undertaken, and what will we be up against now?

[Answer] To begin with, Mr Sommer, you realize -- and you are quite aware of this -- that I am not the inventor of the gas-pipeline deal, nor can I say that I am a fan of this matter, to use Washington's words. However, these contracts and agreements were all there when I took over, and I said in my government statement following my election -- just as I very strongly emphasized in Washington -- that it is extremely important for us Germans to be reliable and dependable partners.

Being a reliable partner means strictly abiding by the commitments undertaken, it means that a Yes is a Yes and a No a No. This is why I welcomed the lifting of the sanctions, and prior to my visit I sent the appropriate signals to Washington and conducted the corresponding talks which then culminated in the cancellation of the sanctions you just mentioned.

There is an agreement among the countries involved, and there were intensive negotiations. Without going into further details now in public, I am proceeding from the premise that within a period of perhaps a few weeks all the parties involved will approve these agreements -- and I mean all parties involved. I assume that it will then be possible to avoid in the future the type of situation we have just overcome. I certainly believe that if these agreements had been possible earlier, say 2, 3 or 4 years ago, we might have been spared all the criticism that was raised on both sides of the Atlantic.

[Deckert] Mr Chancellor, an obstacle has been removed which, as you say, did not need to be put up at all. It is being replaced by an apparently vague agreement on East-West trade among the participating nations, and some of these nations do not even know yet what the agreement will be like.

[Answer] I must contradict you. At the current stage of talks, I don't think any of the participating nations can say it does not know what is intended.

[Deckert] You mean Paris, London and Brussels are aware of this?

[Answer] I assume that they have the same level of information as we do here in Bonn.

[Decker] Conversely, could one not try now to build something good on the basis of the eliminated obstacle? The Russians are arming because they feel economically weak. They are economically weak because they are arming. Could one not come up with the idea that the West would be obligated to take an initiative, to make a proposal, with the content: concessions in questions of armament here, concessions in economic matters there?

[Answer] The main problem, after all, is the excessive Soviet armament. This is indisputable. There are negotiations underway on this point in Geneva just as there are concrete offers. Let me recall the utterances, the proposals, made by the U.S. President in his Berlin speech on the occasion of his visit to the Federal Republic last summer. I stated in Washington what I have been declaring here, namely that we, the Germans, are keenly interested in seeing that these negotiations in Geneva are intensively and seriously conducted and that the NATO dual decision consists of both parts as far as we are concerned: the first part with the clear objective of negotiating and the second part -- by which we also stand -- in the event that these negotiations fail to be successful, that we naturally fulfill the commitment made by the former government, the Schmidt government.

Now we have a new situation. There is a new number one, a new general secretary of the CPSU. He has been in office for a few days now and the first talks were held. I advocated the view in Washington that it would be useful -- the idea is not new, nor does it come from me but was already aired a year ago -- to achieve a dialogue between the U.S. President and the CPSU general secretary, the new number one in the Kremlin, in the foreseeable future. All this under the proviso, of course, that such a meeting is carefully prepared, that it will not be held solely for reasons of propaganda but for the sake of what is at issue. It is also necessary to have prudent timing. On such an occasion it is possible, of course, to introduce into the debate such ideas as you have developed.

[Sobotta] Obviously, you intend to make some new beginnings in Ostpolitik. Do you personally intend to visit Moscow in the near future? One had the impression that you did not intend to go to Moscow after your election and your nomination for the office of chancellor in view of 6 March. Has this now changed under the new leadership? Do you believe that it might be especially useful for the chancellor to make the European voice heard in Moscow with regard to arms policy?

[Answer] Actually, these are two questions, and I want to deal with them separately. I don't see any interpreter role for Germany or for myself in the dialogue between the world powers. These are shoes which are too big for us. Nor would we enjoy trying to put on such shoes. What we can do is make our contribution from the concrete situation of Germany, and I think this is our duty. We are the country which is located directly on the Iron Curtain. Our fatherland is divided, 17 million of our compatriots are living in the communist sphere of rule, in the GDR.

We have the special commitment toward Berlin. Any world political tensions that come up, any strain, is precipitated there and becomes evident just like on a seismograph of international politics. Thus, we are the first to be anxious about the direct disadvantages. Surely there is no divergent party view among the Germans that we want peace, that we want peace in freedom, and we need to make our contribution to this end.

I believe this can be done by reasonably advancing our position time and again toward both the East and the West. To me, it goes without saying that such a reasonable way also includes contacts with Moscow. During my term as FRG chancellor to date, which comes to 6 weeks now, I have had quite a few talks with representatives from Moscow, and I do not at all rule out the possibility that a direct contact will come at a time yet to be determined. There are indications that Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko will come to Bonn possibly before the end of the year, perhaps in December.

I would expressly welcome such a visit at the end of the year and at the beginning of the new year with its important decision on the NATO dual decision. But as far as any dates on a visit on my part are concerned, I cannot say anything as yet. All I can say is this: Such a date is hardly conceivable prior to the anticipated election date of 6 March.

[Muehlfenzl] But you are not only expecting Mr Gromyko in early December but also, if I read it properly today, his American counterpart, Mr Shultz?

[Answer] Yes.

[Meuhlfensl] Does this not lead to the conclusion that it is especially important to you to -- let us say -- liven up the East-West dialogue and also the talks in the environment of Geneva?

[Answer] Just a while ago I gave myself my own cue: talking with each other and not talking about each other. Just yesterday morning I had a very good talk with the U.S. secretary of state, who had just come back from Moscow. So I had a chance to take along some first-hand impressions, as it were. Last night I had an opportunity to air the impressions gained by the UN secretary general, who likewise had just returned from Moscow. My colleague Genscher informed me along these lines.

All this indicates that we do not remain stagnant in the situation as it is now, but that we proceed from the realities and facts now that there is a new man -- let us not say: Is this a man for a transition period or not? There is a lot of speculation and I think all that is wrong.

And I believe that it will be all the easier for us because our position is quite unequivocal and clear.

[Sommer] How does your East-West philosophy fit into the trade issue? While you were in the United States, an emissary of the U.S. President was here in Europe and told us that somewhere in the Atlantic, microchips from toys had been found in Soviet sonar buoys. And the message he spread around here really was that the best solution would be no East-West trade at all. Everthing was to the benefit of the Soviets. And behind this, then, was the demand for a trade war or refusal of trade. How do you see this matter?

[Answer] To begin with, Mr Sommer, I must say that I don't know who spread this message around here. I did not hear this message at all from the pertinent men in Washington: the President, the secretaries of defense, state and the treasury, to list just three of them. I did not meet anyone there, not even in the Senate [advocating this] to add this for the sake of rounding out the picture.

I had a chance to talk with the most important Senate representatives repsonsible for foreign affairs and defense policy from both parties at a breakfast yesterday morning. I did not hear anything about a trade war idea being evident there.

The Americans themselves face great economic problems as well. But in the United States one opinion is quite clear, which I think is sensible: Notwithstanding the necessary aye for the trade overture -- to me there is no doubt about it -- there is the question of whether it is really sensible that the West supplies strategic goods which benefit the Soviet Union in its arms potential. I not only heard examples such as those you mentioned, but also others. Yet, all examples mentioned to me involved U.S. deliveries. Hence, this was no accusation against Europeans or Germans, but rather the highly self-critical question of American contacts: Is it really sensible for us to supply the Russians with important components for armament sectors which they themselves cannot produce, thus promoting their own excessive armament. I think this is quite a logical conclusion.

[Sobotta] Let me ask you directly in this context: What is directly connected to this is the question concerning the arms buildup and/or the negotiations on the reduction of these medium-range missiles in particular. Can you say after this U.S. visit that the Americans really see headway in Geneva, where the reduction of the medium-range missiles of the Soviet Union is the principal point at issue? You know just as well as we do that that counterarmament, also on German territory, will be a highly sensitive topic domestically in 1983, provided it comes to that counterarmament. I would like to know how far the negotiations have progressed. Naturally, one cannot hear any details, but it ought to be possible to bring back an overall impression from the United States in the interim.

[Answer] I must tell you, Mr Sobotta, that I needn't have gone to Washington for that. We are being regularly and intensively informed indeed -- again I can say this only for the few weeks I have been in office, but I am sure that this was so or similar before as well. Friday of this week, for example, one of the main negotiators will be coming here again, the U.S. chief delegate in Geneva, to deliver a report. Thus, we are kept abreast of developments.

And from what I know, I can only say that, first, I feel adequately and well informed and, second, I have the secure feeling -- in fact I know -- that the Americans are negotiating in all earnestness, that is, seriously.

Naturally, I cannot say anything in public here about the state of the negotiations. I also believe that we simply must reckon now that a minor pause has set in, not in the negotiations but in the decision-making process now that a new leadership has come and in view of the fact that in the past several weeks business in Moscow was conducted somewhat reservedly, considering the state of health of Leonid Brezhnev, and understandably so, of course. But to go by all that I hear, the new general secretary will quite directly pick up the business without any pause for breath and with determination. And I believe that it will be possible for us to see farther in Geneva in the next few months.

[Deckert] Mr Chancellor, while you were received in the United States in a festive and friendly manner, the representatives of the Federal Republic were clearly given preferential treatment by protocol in Moscow as well. Is it not inevitably true that we do have a special role since we are located at the front line of the East-West confrontation? You rejected the title of mediator. You earlier said so when your predecessor wanted to play an independent role in the median between East and West. But is it not true that a chancellor is simply urged by events to play a role between the blocs? This does not have to be called the role of a mediator. It must not be that big. It could also be called scout or, for all I know, initiator of talks. Is it enough if we wait for signals from Geneva, or would it not be proper for us to advance a proposal of our own for a change?

[Answer] Let me revert once again to the point of mediator or interpreter. I insist that this cannot be our role. We would be biting off more than we could chew. If you take a look at the last 100 years of German history, you will find that the last, great mediator position had been the Berlin Congress and Otto von Bismarck, and I am reluctant to investigate now post facto whether this did us so much good. All these are concepts for which one must pay afterwards. And that's what we have done in history.

[Sobotta] I have another concrete question pertaining to the special role the Germans have to play between East and West. You have clearly said that we would be prepared, if necessary, to counterarm. In concrete terms, this means deploying missiles on our territory which, if need be, could reach the Soviet Union. This would be something new. My question is: Would you make this contingent on the condition that other West European NATO states which are nonnuclear powers go along?

[Answer] To preface my answer, let me say that this decision, this offer was made by the Schmidt government, and it is quite correct to draw attention to Helmut Schmidt's services in bringing the NATO dual decision about. I heard him say in the Bundestag that he helped formulate the decision. The Social Democrats' problem today is that they are now wondering whether the majority of their party still supports this decision made at the time by chancellor Helmut Schmidt whom they had selected. My political friends and I and the FDP-CDU/CSU coalition continue to support both parts of this policy — we support the necessary negotiations and, if the negotiations fail to produce the required results, we support the deployment of missiles. The question of whether we must do this by ourselves no longer applies because there is already one partner -- Rome, which I will be visiting tomorrow -- which has clearly committed itself to this decision with all its implications.

[Deckert] The new man in Moscow is not an unknown, and the Western world's intelligence services wouldn't be worth their money if they couldn't provide a character study of this new man. You said in Washington that you knew as little as the interviewer when asked how to assess the new general secretary.

[Answer] The question was what he would do, not how to assess him. I'm no Kremlinologist.

[Deckert] Fair enough, then let me ask you if you can't say anything about what he is expected to do? Is it impossible to define the degree of hope?

[Answer] First of all, I think it would be a serious mistake to identify the Soviet leadership with one man. This has not been the case since Stalin. There has always been a leadership team in the Soviet Union since Stalin. Depending on the time, one of the members became particularly prominent as the number one man -- that was true for Khruschev, this was true for Brezhnev, and surely this will be true now. It is certainly proper for this man's handwriting to then become visible in politics. This was quite clearly the case in the Brezhnev era which has just come to a close. It is impossible to say after only a few days what will characterize the new man's Mr Andropov's handwriting. However, there are some concrete facts which must be considered.

He has entered into this decisive office in the Soviet Union at the age of 68. He will certainly try to implement his political views in the few years he has at his disposal. He is faced with the concrete international situation we have been discussing. He finds himself facing a very bad situation in the Soviet economy, and he is finding clear problems in the Warsaw Pact. In this context, all I need to mention here is Poland.

This means that the tasks have been preset. Based on a number of observations, are indications that he may well be the man who would be prepared to take some steps, not only in the very strong arms economy -- which obviously has been recently supported by the military -- but also with a view to the urgent necessity for a better or more satisfactory meeting of consumer requirements in the Soviet Union. You are aware of the old considerations, dating back to the Khruschev era, which are connected with the name of Professor Liebermann. There is the example in the Warsaw Pact of Hungary, which has performed under Kadar. It may be that things will proceed in that direction. However, I think we needn't speculate now. We will wait and see, and I think he will find out rather quickly what the new trend will be.

[Muehlfenzl] Allow me to change the subject now, Mr Chancellor. Your government's economic concept, which I might briefly refer to as a strengthening of investments and as a strengthening of the supply side and of production, is being fought by the trade unions and also by the Social Democrats with the formula that it is a redistribution from the bottom to the top -- this is what they have been calling it lately, I believe. Will you be able to adhere to this policy, which can only be applied over the long term, against the recognizable resistance of a trade union front as well, especially with a view to the short period until 6 March -- if that is still the deadline?

[Answer] To begin with, Mr Muehlfenzl, anybody knows that the problems we have -- unemployment at an unprecedented level of over 2 million persons, a serious economic crisis, the complete overtasking of the public budgets, meaning the drastic debt increase -- cannot be solved overnight, let alone by 6 March.

What rather matters now is to soberly take stock, initiating steps in the right direction which will take effect as soon as possible. We are doing this in a very tangible example: the construction sector. By all experience -- and this also is an experience I returned with from Washington -- this is a sector, including the concomitant business branches, in which the economic boom can be most quickly revitalized and cranked up. It is also necessary, however, to muster the required endurance for the course of recuperation.

This course must have one great objective above all else; namely, halting and reducing unemployment as quickly as possible. Within the framework of this objective, the most important target for me personally is unemployed youth. Now we have more than 300,000 young people between the ages of 15 and 25 who are without jobs. We still have a considerable number of vocational training openings. I believe that we must yet increase this number -- and this is my constant discourse with the representatives of the economy -- and we must tell as many young people as possible: Don't take a job immediately just to make money, but instead, try to obtain first-rate training if possible, even if this takes 3 years, because the present unemployment rate once again makes apparent the old inevitability: Anyone having good training has a better chance in professional life; whoever does not have any, or only poor training, will lose his job more quickly. Thus, even in this situation you can still try to do what is right and good. And that's what I propose to do.

[Sommer] Mr Federal Chancellor, do you have the impression that the economic development in the United States could have a positive effect on our economy, or didn't you discuss this subject at all in view of the fact that the lectures of your predecessor on the high-interest rate policy and the budget were not well received there?

[Answer] I must repeat that I have no intention of talking about my predecessor now and criticizing him. This would be totally unreasonable of you. I repeat therefore, let's talk about the present. I had long talks with the secretary of the treasury and the president of the Federal Reserve Bank. The Americans had an important goal, namely, bringing down their exorbitant rate of inflation. They did that at the cost of very high unemployment. I talked about that with trade union President Kirkland. It is a very bitter price they are paying, and it is a policy we can't and don't want to pursue -- to make it quite clear. We have a different starting position, also on principle.

As you know, for a long time they had a double-digit rate of inflation, and in 1983 they expect it to be between 5, 6 or 7 percent. Compared to what they had 1 year ago, this is an enormous change, I think. They also expect a gradual recovery of the economy. Due to the interest-rate situation in the United States, the economy advanced relatively slowly. We will have to wait and see, although I don't have to tell you in this round how much we depend on the development of interest rates in the United States. In the scope of what I could say there, I made it quite clear how desirable it is for us that the U.S. interest rates are lowered, and that this naturally will be of basic advantage to Europe and not only to us.

KOHL BRIEFS MITTERRAND, THATCHER ON U.S. VISIT

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl has briefed French President Francois Mitterrand and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher by telephone on the substance of his visit to the United States.

During Monday's telephone conversation, Mitterrand invited the federal chancellor to a discussion at the Elysee Palace. There will be an opportunity for this during the congress of the European People's Party 6-7 December in Paris. A government spokesman in Bonn announced today that Kohl and Mitterrand will meet on 7 December. The European People's Party is a union of Christian-Democratic and conservative parties of West Europe in Strasbourg's European Parliament.

The federal chancellor telephoned Mrs Thatcher this morning. These informative talks, conducted on both sides by way of simultaneous interpreters, demonstrates, according to the government spokesman, the close contacts which the federal chancellor has maintained with partner states since taking office.

GERMAN-CSSR BORDER COMMISSION BEGINS TALKS

[Text] Prague, 22 Nov (DPA) -- The CSSR and FRG border commission began talks in Prague on Monday. The talks, which will last several days, will deal with questions of border marking, enviromental protection and the cooperation of the border and customs organs of the two states.

At the start of the talks, both sides noted with satisfaction that the common border is a "quiet" border with few incidents. However, the most important problem which the commission will have to solve is the question of the heavy enviromental pollution which reaches Bavarian territory, in particular from the northwest Bohemian region.

EGYPT DAILIES INTERVIEW MITTERRAND ON MIDEAST

NC230001 Cairo MENA in Arabic 2330 GMT 22 Nov 82

[Text] Cairo, 22 Nov (MENA) — French President Francois Mitterrand has announced that peace in the Middle East will not be achieved without mutual recognition between the Arab world and Israel. He said the combination of the recognition of the rights of the states in the region that are recognized by the United Nations, and the rights of the peoples, among whom are the Palestinian people, alone will lead to the realization of peace.

In a comprehensive interview with AL-AHRAM and AL-AKHBAR to be published in tomorrow's editions, the French president added that he is the first European president to call for the right of the Palestinians to establish their state -- on condition that the Palestine Liberation Organization accepts the principle of mutual recognition. If the PLO accepts this, it becomes incumbent upon Israel to introduce an initiative for them, and then it becomes natural for the PLO to participate in the peace negotiations.

President Mitterrand clarified his opinion of the plans and initiatives introduced in the international arena as part of the peace efforts. He said that he believes in the necessity of giving Reagan's initiative the appropriate chance and that while France does not accept all the conditions of the Fes summit resolutions, it considers them a good way to begin the negotiations process.

Regarding the Egyptian-French plan, President Francois Mitterrand mentioned that it must not be presented as a substitute or alternative for the other initiatives. Rather, it represents a different method that is embodied in the fundamental principles that are common to the posture of Egypt and France regarding the crisis. He said that we may find ourselves forced to return to it, and that the Camp David agreement has already given what it was capable of giving and has resulted in the achievement of peace between Egypt and Israel. He added that the fate of the Palestinians cannot be decided on without their having expressed their opinion.

When the Frnch president was asked about the possibility of achieving this in the face of the Israeli rejection, he said that in this regard, the mutual good intentions, perseverance and courage are the only means which France has to pressure Israel.

Commenting on the current crisis in Lebanon, French President Francois Mitterrand said the withdrawal of all the foreign forces from Lebanon is a fundamental condition for resolving this problem. He said France's participation in the multinational force in Lebanon is aimed at preventing new confrontations and tragic incidents from taking place. He also said France is helping Lebanon to support and build its army in light of the historic and ancient relations which have linked France and Lebanon. He added that France will not do anything that does not express the desire and views of the Lebanese Government.

In the interview, President Mitterrand touched upon developments in the Gulf war between Iraq and Iran. He said this conflict is considered one of the most dangerous conflicts in modern history because it is taking place in a strategic area that contains massive wealth. Mitterrand added that so far, this conflict has not received the required attention and that France will utilize its role as a Security Council member and its old traditional relations with Iran and Iraq to ease this conflict.

Commenting on Egyptian-French relations, President Mitterrand said the current relations between the two countries are not of the ordinary, conventional type. Rather, they are active relations. He said his points of view coincided with those of President Mubarak on several issues when the latter visited France following President Mitterrand's assumption of the presidency.

The French president added that the cooperation between the two countries in the political, economic and military domains is advancing positively and progressing without any obstacles. He said France will not hestitate to provide all the economic aid to Egypt necessary to help it overcome all of its problems, despite the fact that the international economic situation may limit France's moves in this direction.

The French president referred to his country's eagerness to maintain its cultural and educational relations with Egypt and said the cultural exchanges are not confined to the elite but reach the popular levels.

In the interview, the French president dealt with international issues. He said he could not predict with certainty the kinds of changes in the environment of international detente that will result from Brezhnev's death. He said that France, despite its commitment as a member of NATO, as a result of the conditions created after World War II, does not accept the military imbalance which is extant in Europe, and on the other hand, it does not care to participate in an economic embargo against the Soviet Union because that may lead to an economic war.

He said that the unique policy France is following makes it believe that the nonaligned policy is necessary for a large number of world states, including Eygpt. This is because the Nonaligned Movement is one of the fundamental factors of the international equation, especially in light of the two blocs' inclination to exercise a policy of interference.

President Mitterrand expressed his concern about progress in the Third World and its economic situation. He said dialogue between the North and the South is gradually ceasing. President Mitterrand called for the participation of international organizations and institutions, such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, to play a greater role in helping the developing states that do not have oil and to work out specific policies for the agricultural products and raw materials which these states produce.

The French President talked about the Socialist regime he is leading in France. He said France is getting closer in its experience to the Austrian socialist experience. He added that socialism is the essence of a long experience. As far as France is concerned, economic and social socialism are inseparable from political democracy and respect for human rights. Where there is no political democracy, there is no socialism.

PCI OPPOSES FORMING NEW FIVE-PARTY COALITION

[PCI Directorate 18 November communique]

[Text] The PCI Directorate heard a report from Comrade Enrico Berlinguer on the course of the government crisis and approved the stances and proposals presented by the party delegation in its meetings with the president of the republic and the prime minister-designate and its statements to the press. The government coalition parties have produced no clear and consistent indications from the political and program viewpoint for embarking on a positive solution of the alarming crisis to which our country has been brought. Once again the quest for a solution has been started amid a confused and ambiguous climate with an interplay of mutual suspicions and blackmail in which partisan interests and advantages seem predominant.

The DC's conduct in no way suggests that, with the post claimed for Senator Fanfani, it really intends to pursue in an innovative manner a policy of regeneration of the economy and the state based on equity and rigorousness, modifying its own attitudes of substantial support for employers and of social conservatism. The Socialist Party is still entangled in the contradiction between proposals of some positive objectives in the economic and social field and the substantial acceptance of the logic of the old alliances. It is obviously in the interests of the workers and people's masses that this contradiction be resolved. The danger is that everything will be reduced to a grim dispute over the duration of a new government and a quarrel about the date -- winter or spring -- of early general elections.

The recourse to provisional governments dependent on agreements on or proposals of early elections is now intolerable, by virtue of the country's needs and interests. The PCI believes it is the parties' duty to specify their positions on this point as clearly as possible.

In view of the country's dire straits, any reconstitution of the five-party coalition is unacceptable. Confirming that such solutions will find the PCI in opposition, the Communists reassert their belief that the country needs an authoritative and secure political leadership whose strength and ability to adopt rigorous measures are based on the consensus of the broad people's masses -- a consensus that cannot be obtained except by providing guarantees of equity and the certainty of a commitment to open the way to regeneration and to structural transformations.

The major cost of the crisis must be paid not by the labor world, southern Italy, the most productive sectors and the most underprivileged and least productive sectors, but by the forces of privilege, speculation and parasitism. The most important test bench, partly also for assessing government solutions, is the attitude adopted toward the current social conflict. Indeed, it is now a national necessity, which should involve all the democratic parties, to act to make the General Confederation of Italian Industry alter its intransigent stance, which is the principal cause of the exacerbation of the social conflict.

The directorate decided to convene the Central Committee and Central Control Commission on 23 November to examine the policy document for the 16th congress.

POPE VISITS SICILY; SECURITY MEASURES TIGHT

AU201558 Rome ANSA in English 1512 GMT 20 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Palermo, November 20 -- Pope John Paul II arrived here this morning from Rome for a two-day visit to Sicily, the first ever by a pontiff.

There is much anticipation among the island's churchmen who hope the pope will endorse their war on the Mafia. The visit comes just three months after Mafia hitmen gunned down Palermo Prefect General Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa and his young wife. Sicilian church leaders have recently stepped up their attacks on the Mafia and organized crime and called for the excommunication of all gang members. The pope's visit was preceded by an escalation in gang warfare. Six people, two on Thursday, three yesterday and one early this morning, were killed in the Palermo area. The pope's visit will not deal only with the Mafia, Palermo Archbishop Salvatore Pappalardo said yesterday that the visit "will serve as a valid support for the authentic Christian values of the island".

Traffic has been paralyzed in downtown Palermo and many streets have been blocked off. Security measures are very tight for the duration of the pope's stay in the city.

Condemns Mafia, Ends Visit

AU220847 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 22 Nov 82

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Vatican City, November 22 -- Pope John Paul II, the first reigning pontiff to visit Sicily in six centuries, sharply condemned the Mafia Sunday and reconfirmed the church of Rome's excommunication of the Mafia pronounced by the bishops of the island in 1944, 1952 and again one month ago.

Addressing a gathering of young people in Palermo's central Politeama Square in the afternoon, the pope spoke of a "new future and society in which the Mafia and its ramifications will be isolated and destroyed" an echo of a statement he made Saturday in the same square on "acts of barbarous violence which have bloodied the streets for a long time".

Earlier Sunday, the archbishop of Palermo, Msgr. Salvatore Pappalardo, co-celebrated a mass with the pontiff and 41 sicilian priests in the hippodrome in the capital in which he delivered a message based on rampant crime on the island, the "hate, revenge, crimes of violence" and the "notorious Mafia avid for power".

While John Paul was returning to the Vatican in the evening, Vatican spokesman Father Romeo Pancioli said that the pope omitted passages from the prepared text of his speech delivered in Politeama Square in the afternoon only because he was running behind schedule.

The two most significant passages found in the copy made available shortly before the pope's appearance but skipped in delivery were a plea to the young people to "confront fatalism, disintegration and 'omerta' with tenacious hope" and a line asserting that Mafia crimes deserve "the open moral condemnation" of the Sicilian bishops as expressed in excommunication. "Omerta" referred to in the text of the pope's speech is the conspiracy on silence which traditionally covers Mafia activities on the island.

Father Panciroli, in further response to the surprise expressed in many quarters over the failure of the pope to deliver these lines, said that the complete text of his speech is valid and will be published in today's edition of the Vatican daily, OBSERVATORE ROMANO. In standing behind the full text of his speech, the pope will also have endorsed the Sicilian bishop's war on the Mafia and the excommunication they pronounced last month against anyone involved in Mafia crimes.

EXPRESSO INTERVIEWS PCP'S ALVARO CUNHAL

PM230801 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 13 Nov 82 pp 35-39 (Review Section)

[Interview with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal 8 November in Lisbon by Jose Antonio Saraiva and Miguel Almeida Fernandes]

[Excerpts] Jose Antonio Saraiva: In the days of Salazar, a public official who was dismissed from his job for political reasons found employment in private enterprise. I ask you: In the Eastern bloc countries, where there are no private enterprises, when a public official is dismissed or persecuted for political reasons, what are the chances of rebuilding his life? And even if he had any, I would like to ask you whether this fact does not cause some constraint, or even some terror. I mean: Who has the courage to face up to the only existing employer?

Alvaro Cunhal: Well, I thought this was an interview about Portugal -- we are Portuguese and live in Portugal, in such a difficult and complex situation -- but I see that -- as usual, -- there are journalists who begin interviews with diversionary questions which in themselves already have an ideological and accusatory content. I regret that in an interview with EXPRESSO we should begin with the problems most removed from the Portuguese people while we are currently experiencing pressing problems within the perspective of the democratic system itself.

As regards your question, I know of no dismissals of public officials in socialist countries. I am unaware of situations in which people, who may possibly be replaced in their posts, are left without a chance of earning their living. So I believe that this question contains accusations which reality does not justify.

Eanes' Address

Miguel Almeida Fernandes: To change the subject, what is your opinion of the president of the republic's address on Friday evening? The PCP information and propaganda section has issued a note in which it basically ends up by saying that the address did not come up to expectations -- specifically through keeping the government in office and not dissolving the Assembly of the Republic.

Cunhal: Exactly. There were news media which said that the Communist Party merely stated that the president's address did not come up to expectations, without adding what you have just said. It was a matter of first impressions, an initial reaction. The contents of the president's address will also receive a closer examination on our part. However, I can immediately emphasize that the address contains two differentiated sections: One of them is an analysis of the revision of the Constitution and the other is a kind of program of institutional and political action. As regards the analysis, it contains elements which would have long ago justified the measures which we propose: The dismissal of the government and the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic before the revision of the Constitution. As for the program of institutional and political action, what we can say is that there is a very well known lesson in the peoples' wisdom and struggle. In many situations an actual deed is worth more than a dozen programs.

Fernandes: The PCP supported General Ramalho Eanes' repeat candidacy at the end of the first round. Afterwards, since January 1981, the PCP began to insist on the government's dismissal, and Eanes has so far paid no heed to these proposals or suggestions. How do you view this situation?

Cunhal: This shows how incorrect the accusation is which has been leveled by the rightwing parties that General Eanes plays into the Communist Party's hands. In our opinion, General Eanes has long had 1,001 institutional and political reasons for dismissing the government and adopting the measures which we propose. He has not adopted them, which we regret.

Democratic Alliance's "Plan for Coup"

Saraiva: At a certain stage, Sa Carneiro made a point of proposing a group of coherent state bodies which could form a unified bloc: the president of the republic, the Assembly of the Republic and the government. I ask you whether the left will some day be in a position to put forward a plan of this kind.

Cunhal: That plan of coherence as you call it, is a plan for a coup; something very different from a democratic plan. It was an attack on all the state bodies. It is still continuing today along new lines. What was being sought was for the democratic system to become a single part system or a two-party coalition -- and for all the state bodies to ultimately be dominated by them, thereby leaving no opportunity for the democratic game in a society which they themselves enthusiastically proclaimed to be a pluralist society. We believe that in a democratic system such as the Portuguese system, there may be an advantage in the existence of a certain political diversification in the state bodies. Coherence does not lie in the holding of all posts by the same party, especially a party which has no opening toward the opposition forces and which -- from the experience of its everyday activity -- is attempting to monopolize the state resources which it may temporarily have at its disposal by being in power. Hence it was a matter of an attack on power. That plan is still continuing today, but in a new way.

It now takes the form of the revision of the Constitution at the military level. That is where the greatest danger to Portuguese democracy lies. With the current national defense law, if the leader of counterrevolution, Freitas do Amaral, remained defense minister, and if the appointment of the chiefs of staff and military leaders were what is clearly sought by the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] and its chairman, the CDS and the forces supporting it might achieve a radical change in the military situation, with the restoration of a fascist or fascist-type military hierarchy and the holding of responsible posts in units by officers at the service of the plan of destruction of the Portuguese democratic system.

We do not believe that conditions currently exist for the democratic forces (with the existing political parties and with their current leaderships) to be able to put forward a joint program, a joint program of government.

However -- and this is a fundamental observation -- many signs indicate that there is no coincidence between the alignment of social forces in the social struggle on the one hand, and the alignment of the political forces and parties on the other. Through their position in the current situation the party forces no longer correspond to the alignment of the classes and the social strata or their positon in the country's social and political struggle.

That is why we have asserted that the loss of influence by the Democratic Alliance and the Socialist Party [PSP] has created what we have called an extremely broad social and political vacuum which does not identify with other existing parties. A section (as a result of the dissatisfaction created by the Democratic Alliance or the PSP) is approaching our policy but is not coming as far as us.

New Party: "Favorable Conditions"

Fernandes: Do you mean that the Communist Party deems necessary or advocates a new political party in the Eanist area?

Cunhal: What we have said is that the objective conditions are favorable for the formation of new parties. If there are millions of Portuguese people who do not identify with any of the existing parties (but take part in the social and political struggle in the most diverse ways), the objective conditions have been created for the formation of a new party.

Fernandes: And do you accept the Eanist party?

Cunhal: I am coming to the Eanist party. In relation to this matter in general, we recognize the Portuguese people's right to form parties, and we do not believe that the current parties have a monopoly on the existence of parties. That is the first point, which has been disputed in practice by some of the existing parties, including the CDS, the Social Democratic Party [PSD[and the PSP, which maintains: "We exist: we do not recognize the right of others to come into existence."

As regards what is called the Eanist party, we do not believe that the president of the republic can be the leader of a party, but we deem it legitimate for party groupings to support a president of the republic. There is no question of it being a party commanded or led by the president of the republic, but we realize that there could be aparty which supports President General Eanes' policy.

Moreover, in 1980, in the Democratic Alliance and PSP election campaign for the presidency, they linked government action with the policy of the president (elected or to be elected). So why be surprised or protest if a party which supports this president of the republic emerges?

Fernandes: Is the PCP not afraid that the possible emergence of a Eanist Party could deprive it of some social basis of support?

Cunhal: We do not analyze the political situation with electioneering criteria. We do not make that calculation. And partly because we do not make that calculation, it it very natural that we have far more votes than we used to have.

Fernandes: Bearing in mind that any party's ambition is to take power, and since the PCP does not make those calculations, how do you envisage this matter in Portugal in 1982?

Cunhal: Taking power does not figure in the PCP's documents or blueprint. What does figure in them is the demand and the struggle for a democratic government. We believe that a democratic government, under the conditions existing in Portugal, will need to reckon with the workers in order to be efficient and succeed in resolving the nation's problems, not only with the workers' support, but with the workers' active participation toresolve the problems. And in Portugal, under the specific conditions in which we are living, the workers' participation also means the Communist Party's participation.

So the democratic solutions and the response to the major national problems can hardly be achieved if the PCP does not enter the system of government. This means that, with the capacity which our party has and its mass support, we propose to take part in the resolution of the nation's problems by a democratic government.

This is something very different from a plan to take power. It is a plan to serve the people and the country within the context of an agreement among democrats, with a platform, of course, which will succeed in resolving the extremely grave problems confronting us.

Now, as regards the political forces which could take part in such a solution, the PSP is currently continuing with a policy of de facto alliance with the parties in power. The formation of new parties could change the party picture.

Destruction of PSP and Bipolarization

Saraiva: When the PCP supports the emergence of a new party, is it not aiming at the destruction of the PSP, believing that agreement with that party (Eanist or otherwise) will be easier than with the current PSP?

Cunhal: In the first place, I wish to explain that it is not a matter of our supporting a new party. We do not support or declare that we support any party. What we are saying is that the objective conditions have been created for the formation of new parties, and we believe that Portuguese democracy would have nothing to lose if more democratic parties were formed. In no way do we have a policy aimed at the destruction of the PSP. What we believe is that the PSP has destroyed itself with its own policy. The PSP had a set of leaders with some prestige, with vocational training and with the ability to take part in several areas of national life. Now we find that that leadership has virtually disappeared. The people with the most intellectual prestige within the PSP have disappeared from the PSP.

We also find that many socialists are now on United People Alliance [APU] tickets. We have always wanted a strong PSP in Portugal with a role which could be highly important in the defense, development and buiding of a democratic society in Portugal; however, its current course, the PSP allied to the Democratic Alliance is helping the latter to remain in power.

An alliance is sought on the basis of very specific facts. If the Democratic Alliance loses the majority in the Assembly of the Republic, as we expect -- and it would certainly lose in legislative elections -- the system of alliances itself will change. I believe that the PSP, with the Democratic Alliance in a minority, would not have the same position which it has had during this stage, with the Democratic Alliance in a majority in the Assembly of the Republic. And if new democratic parties emerged, the possibilities of alliances would be broadened.

Fernandes: In the event of a split in the Democratic Alliance -- there is a good deal of talk about this happening in December or January -- and bearing in mind that the new party will not emerge immediately, how does the Communist Party view the issue of alliances? How does it view the possibility of taking part in a government with the PSD or the PSP?

Cunhal: A significant decline of the Democratic Alliance in the local elections will only confirm the need to undertake what the Communist Party is advocating: Dismissal of the government and the holding of early elections.

The Democratic Alliance's defeat would change the party picture completely. Something would also change within the PSP, but the local elections will not reflect the PSP's decline. The PSP could lose votes and win the municipal councils. In any event, the PSP would suffer a major setback in legislative elections.

Fernandes: What will winning the elections mean for the APU in local authority terms?

Cunhal: In those terms it means strengthening its majorities and winning some municipal and parish councils.

Fernandes: If it keeps what it has held, does it regard this as a defeat?

Cunhal: No, but it is no victory, either. However, there are two results which political observers should bear in mind. The number of municipal councils won by the Democratic Alliance has nothing to do with that coalition's victory. There could be a great defeat for the Democratic Alliance, even if it retains most of the municipal councils. We have two yardsticks: First, the number of municipal and parish councils, and second, the percentage -- in our opinion, a significant fall in votes for the Democratic Alliance strengthens the necessity for the immediate dismissal of its government.

Saraiva: You talk a great deal about left and right, progressives and reactionaries. Are you in favor of bipolarization?

Cunhal: No. The PCP is not in favor of bipolarization. Moreover, we believe that the current trend in Portugal is not in that direction. The Democratic Alliance is disintegrating, the republican and socialist front has disintegrated, there are grave disagreements in several parties and there are areas which are not filled, but are tending to be. There are movements which are tending to fill areas of the political picture. There are conditions for the formation of new parties. The PCP regards this diversification as favorable to democracy and is in favor of an agreement among the forces of the democratic area.

Italianization of PSP and PCP

Saraiva: There is a great deal of talk about the Italianization of the PSP. I ask: Could that Italianization of the PSP occur before the Communist Party's own Italianization occurs? That is, do you not believe that for the PSP to suffer a significant loss of votes in favor of the Communist Party it would be necessary for the PCP to previously present a more open, less sectarian image less dependent on the Eastern bloc?

Cunhal: Comparisons with foreign countries are very interesting, but perhaps it would be more interesting now if we referred to Spain and Italy.

What is curious is that Dr Mario Soares said the same thing about the PCE and its more open image. However, we find that communist parties with that kind of image, praised by Dr Mario Soares, have had catastrophic election results to the advantage of the socialist parties, as we have just seen in the neighboring country. Now it can be better understood why Dr Mario Soares was so interested in the PCP becoming a eurocommunist party.

Our party is very well placed, not only in the social struggle but also in relation to the electorate. Nor are we a closed and sectarian party.

"We Would Be Heading for 3 Percent Like Spaniards"

Fernandes: However, there is a fundamental issue. Whereas, for instance, the PCI ceased to be Leninist to become only Marxist, the PCP maintains a Marxist-Leninist doctrine. If, for the sake of optimization, the PCP made that ideological turnaround...

Cunhal: We would be heading for 3 percent like the Spaniards.... Moreover, that would be pure opportunism to sacrifice ideals and principles with a view to election results. We are a communist party, we are not a social democratic party.

Fernandes: Do you regard the PCI as a Social Democratic Party?

Cunhal: No, but we believe that certain concepts and influences of social democracy may influence the Italian workers' movement and certain concepts upheld even by the PCI.

We are a communist party with the Communists' aim: To build a society without exploiters or exploited. Hence, the commitment which we had to the Portuguese revolution's transformations of the socioeconomic structures. The workers and the PCP had the merit of contributing to those transformations which were enshrined in the Constitution: A Constitution which was approved by Mario Soares' PSP and by the PSD -- The Popular Democratic Alliance at the time. If to be sectarian is to struggle consistently against the Democratic Alliance's policy and against the PSP's policy of alliances with the Democratic Alliance, then we are sectarian.

Saraiva: The PCP has long advocated keeping the Council of the Revolution in office, even beyond the revision of the Constitution. On the other hand, it has also long advocated the dismissal of the Democratic Alliance government, which was elected by means of a popular vote. The Communist Party can therefore support keeping an unelected body in office and advocate the dismissal of an elected body. I ask you: Is not this attitude inconsistent with a democratic attitude and one of respect for its rules? That is: Does the PCP support or oppose this or that state body, not because it is or is not elected by the population, but because it does or does not benefit it under certain political circumstances?

Cunhal: This question could be put to any other party existing in Portugal. They have all opposed the existence of elected bodies (demanded the dismissal of the government or of the president of the republic and so forth).

PCP Does Not Oppose Democratic Functioning

This is important. It cannot be said that the PCP is a force which opposes the institutions' democratic functioning. I believe that it is a fundamental principle under democracy for a party to want a certain body to remain in office. You cannot oppose the process of a party expressing an opinion on the continuation or otherwise of a certain political force in state office.

As regards retaining the Council of the Revolution, I wish to say that there were no objections on our part to that body remaining in office. We believed that the transitional stage of Portuguese democracy was not over. The idea is this: We accepted that there be a revision which would not immediately envisage the dissolution of the Council of the Revolution, and that the revision not be effected in this legislative term of the Assembly of the Republic.

As for the dismissal of the Democratic Alliance government, it is true that it is based on a parliamentary majority achieved in the 5 October [1980] election. However, legitimacy to govern cannot follow solely from a simple parliamentary majority achieved at a certain moment and, moreover, by questionable means. Immediately afterward, the leaders of the victorious coalition said that the vote for [presidential candidate] Soares Carneiro was a vote for the Democratic Alliance. Moreover, Freitas do Amaral said that he would accept no government post if General Eanes were elected. They linked Soares Carneiro's victory to the Democratic Alliance's victory.

They lost the 7 December [1980] election. That is when we began to dispute their legitimacy, even in the formal aspect. Afterward, the Democratic Alliance government violated democratic legality from the outset in the most brutal and blatant manner, a further reason for us to dispute the Democratic Alliance's legitimacy to govern and to demand its government's dismissal.

Moreover, Portuguese democracy accepts that a government can be dismissed. It is not an unconstitutional measure. A state body — in this instance, the president of the republic — could (and still can) use his constitutional and legal powers to dismiss the government. Our demand is based on the framework of the democratic institutions and in no way runs counter to the institutions' functioning. It is this government which has run counter to the institutions' functioning.

Saraiva: So let us change the subject. What is the PCP's opinion regarding the revision of the Constitution? You have said that the revision is bad, but could have been worse. Do you not believe, therefore, that by allying with the Democratic Alliance for the revision of the Constitution, the Socialist Party ultimately achieved positive results, since the government coalition was thus unable to achieve everything that it wanted?

Cunhal: The composition of the Assembly of the Republic did not — and does not correspond to the Portuguese people's opinions and therefore it would have been possible to await another opportunity. We know the majority of Socialist deputies were not in favor of this revision. There is a declaration signed by the majority of deputies of the Socialist parliamentary group which states that they voted because of voting discipline but that they believe that the revision implies threats to democracy.

Nevertheless, the revision does not correspond to the Democratic Alliance's original plan, drawn up when they thought they could place General Soares Carneiro in the Belem Palace [seat of presidency]. And the changes made, especially with regard to the military, imply serious threats to the democratic system. Later, the Democratic Alliance and Mario Soares' Socialist Party came to an understanding with basically one aim: The alteration of the governing bodies.

Saraiva: The PCP usually agrees with criticisms of Eastern bloc leaders after they have fallen into disgrace.

Cunhal: What evidence do you have of that?

Saraiva: In Poland, very recently. When those leaders were in power the PCP never criticised them publicly. I will put the question this way: The PCP did not issue criticisms either because it was ill informed about what was happening or because it knew what was happening but concealed it....

Cunhal: For instance, there was no criticism by the PCP of the Polish leaders who were replaced. It was the Polish United Worders Party itself which said they were dismissed. The analysis was not ours.

"I Do Not Criticize Single-Party Systems"

Saraiva: But the PCP did espouse those criticism....

Cunhal: As far as Poland is concerned, we believe that there were very serious errors in party policy with regard to the building of a socialist society. There were errors in economic policy, in wage and price policy, in trade union policy (trade unions linked to the enterprises' administrations, not as organizations truly representative of the workers) and other fundamental errors.

Saraiva: Do you not accept that a similar situation could exist in another Eastern bloc country at present? And that the PCP is now supporting -- because of its ignorance of what is going on -- a situation that tomorrow it will feel obliged to criticize?

Cunhal: We support or regard as positive the things that we believe to be correct. We do not support for the sake of supporting. We may perhaps support things that we subsequently discover to be incorrent, but if we do so it is because of an inadequate acquaintance with the situation, because we are ill informed.

Saraiva: Do you accept the existence of an opposition, albeit not organized, in the Eastern bloc countries?

Cunhal: Let us talk about Portugal first. For Portugal the PCP advocates a multiparty system. But do not ask me to criticize single-party systems in the socialist countries. There can be democratic solutions in socialist countries with only one party or with several parties. This is what happens.

Fernandes: In Portugal how would you defend the existence of an opposition if the PCP were in power?

Cunhal: In terms of the right to organize, to express one's thoughts, democratic freedoms, on one condition; that the freedoms are not used for illegal or unconstitutional ends. All this is stated in the PCP program approved at the last clandestine congress in 1965 (the sixth) and confirmed by the seventh, eight and ninth congresses, held after 15 April.

Fernandes: But this is very subjective....

Cunhal: Subjective?

Fernandes: Where do "legal" freedoms end and "illegal" ones begin?

Cunhal: It is not a question of "legal" and "illegal" freedoms. It is a question of the use of freedoms by counterrevolutionary groups to illegally organize actions with a view to destroying democracy and the freedoms that are an integral part of it. In such cases, it is naturally up to the institutions to judge.

Saraiva: It is said that at one stage it became impossible for you to lead the PCP from the USSR because of bureaucratic difficulties. You moved from there to France. Moreover EXPRESSO recently published an article by a former member of your party on this subject. Is it true what is said?

Cunhal: Well, I have read that article. The first thing I can say is that it is deplorable when people who spend a certain period of their life within the PCP and who sometimes know internal facts about the party later combine true facts with false ones.

Saraiva: But did you ever live in Paris?

Cunhal: I do not answer questions asked in this way. If my party has never revealed it, I am not now going to tell EXPRESSO.

Fernandes: I would like to take this opportunity to ask you a personal question: Why is your private life surrounded by mystery?

Cunhal: It might be a mystery to you, and perhaps a mystery for the photographer accompanying you as well.

Fernandes: Not only us... also for grass roots members of the party that you lead.

Cunhal: It is a matter of style. It is not my style to provide a biographical outline with photographs dating back to my childhood, with my father and mother, my wife and children, to say how many children I have, what my favorite hobbies are, whether or not I draw, whether or not I write....

"My Style:

Fernandes: But I believe that even in the historical context, your clandestine life must contain some interesting aspects.

Cunhal: Every life contains some interesting aspects. What do you want to know? Where I have been? As a human being, I have a personal life, as everybody does. But everyone has his own style. I believe that my style of working and living, even in my political life, is a sound one. In any case, I am convinced that I would have nothing to lose by revealing all this, but I will not do so.

Fernandes: To return to my question, how did the PCP act in clandestinity?

Cunhal: As for that -- my party's activity in clandestinity, where its leadership worked -- I can only tell you that the leadership worked within the country, the decisions being made by the Central Committee. It was the Executive Committee of the Central Committee that was latterly in charge of executive and central activity within the country, it having been decided in 1961 that the Secretariat should remain outside the country, totally or partially. But hitherto nothing has been disclosed, so I believe that this is not the right time to reveal any new facts. However, I would like to say that sometimes people's imagination runs wild. To say that I was in Moscow or in Prague during those years is an example of this.

Saraiva: But did you or did you not lead the PCP from the USSR?

Cunhal: What? From the USSR? The PCP was always led from within the country by the Central Committee, as I have just told you.

Fernandes: One final question. Would you be able to adopt the same stance as Santiago Carrillo, who resigned as PCE secretary general last weekend, following an election disaster?

Cunhal: Carillo's resignation is not only the logical corollary of a major election disaster for a party that advocated an electioneering path, but also a symptom of the ideological, political and practical failure of so-called Eurocommunism.

Within the PCP there is no individual leadership that could in any circumstance place the entire responsibility on the secretary general. Our leadership's system of functioning is not individual, but collective. The secretary general makes no individual decisions on important issues. His responsibility (mine, at present) in the party's political orientation is also the Central Committee's responsibility.

Fernandes: What about the question of succession? Does it worry you?

Cunhal: Not at all, I know that many people are worried about what they call "the succession." We have no succession problems. The PCP secretary general does not lead the party. He takes part in a collective leadership. In a party's life there can be and there always are secretary generals who succeed each other, and so it will inevitably continue.

U.S. SHIFT ON SANCTIONS: VICTORY OR DEFEAT

[Editorial: "Strategic Amendment"]

[Text] The new conditions that the U.S. Administration will try to impose on trade with the Soviet Union to compensate for the lifting of the embargo on the Siberian-European gas pipeline are unknown. It seems that they will aim to be even more punitive for Moscow. However, it remains to be seen how Europe will receive them now that Ronald Reagan has just performed a substantial swing in his foreign policy, moving closer to the recommendations of his allies, specifically the French and Germans.

Be that as it may, the negotiations that the White House proposes to the Europeans on East-West trade do not promise to be easy for the U.S. President. Indeed, with each new concession Reagan risks displeasing both Greeks and Trojans, thus reducing his proclaimed defense of the West to a practice of systematically adjusting to circumstances. First, there was the continuation of grain supplies to the Soviet Union, which prompted the other Western nations to wonder about the legitimacy of the U.S. pressures for a total embargo on technology supplies for the gas pipeline. Then Reagan argued that the grain provided a currency outflow from the Soviet Union, while exactly the opposite would be the case with the gas pipeline. Nevertheless, the Europeans, aware of the repercussions that an embargo would have on their own economies, especially since U.S. interest rates still penalized them, remained loyal to their signed contracts, while the media raised the suspicion that the grain supplies were merely an electoralist method of pleasing the farmers grappling with a large surplus harvest. After only a few months, it is the White House itself that is permitting U.S. enterprises the free supply of technology to the Soviets.

In the European capitals the atmosphere is naturally one of jubilation. An acknowledgement has been made in a case in which the respective governments had adopted resolute stances and, apart from this, it is the start of new opportunities for understanding between the old and new continents -- an understanding that has been somewhat disrupted recently. Of course the gas pipeline process has been facilitated for Moscow too, though perhaps in this respect it is preferable for the Americans to make a concession now than have to acknowledge later that the process had gone ahead despite its opposition. Apart from anything else, an excessively protracted opposition, not very effective moreover, would not fail to be skillfully incorporated into the Soviets' long-term strategy with a view to creating a split within NATO. If we take this aspect into account, perhaps it is not so easy to identify victories or defeats in connection with this swing on President Reagan's part. It all depends on how he will succeed in justifying it at home and on the price he will have to pay to avoid the damage that such changes always inflict on the image.

DEFENSE FORCE COMMANDER ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

LD221452 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 22 Nov 82

[Text] According to the commander of the Defense Forces, General Lauri Sutela, the ratification of a nuclear-free zone in northern Europe by means of agreement arrangements would considerably stabilize the security situation in the area. Sutela, hoped that nuclear states would give guarantees to a nonnuclear north. In the same context, Sutela said that the Finnish Army can considerably lessen the probability of a nuclear attack aimed at Finland's territory by preventing the utilitzation of Finnish territory for military purposes in general. General Sutela holds the view that it is very unlikely that a nuclear war could directly threaten Finland. Finland must, however, be able to protect itself against the indirect effects of nuclear weapons if these are used against targets outside our territory, the commander of the Defense Forces, General Lauri Sutela, pointed out.

GOVERNMENT WINS SUPPORT ON MISSILE FUNDING

[Text] We have just heard here in the studio that the Norwegian Storting has concluded the voting on funds to be paid for the preparatory work for the deployment of NATO's new nuclear missiles in Western Europe. The Norwegian right-wing Government received the support required in the ballot: 77 members voted for and 76 against.

DIFFERENCES WITH USSR OVER FISHING QUOTAS

[Kjell Dragnes report: "Norway and the Soviet Union Deeply Divided on Fish Quotas"]

[Text] The gulf between Norway and the Soviet Union was very great when negotiations on next year's fishing quotas in the Barents Sea began in Oslo yesterday. The Soviet Union proposed a cod quota of only 122,000 tons, whereas Norway takes the view that the same quantity as this year -- 340,000 tons -- could be fished.

The Russians also reiterated their demand that permission for the Norwegians to fish over the quota using passive tackle must be removed from the agreement. The reason for this is Norway's massive overfishing -- 80,500 tons so far this year.

Although the two sides are far apart in the initial stages, it is expected that they will reach an agreement in the course of the week which the talks will last.

The statistics presented on this year's fishing bear witness to a crisis for Soviet cod fishing, even though the Soviet Union has the same quota as Norway -- 170,000 tons -- it has only caught 34,500 tons of cod, 12,400 tons of this in the Norwegian fishing sector. The Soviet Union's normally large catches of blue whiting have also decreased -- around 157,000 tons from a quota of 470,000 tons. The figures indicate that there is likely to be a real set-to this week, and that this time the Soviet Union has weighty arguments for new and stricter regulation of Norwegian coastal fishing.

Temperature conditions in the Barents Sea this year have meant the fish have stayed to the West, so despite the fact that there are fewer fish, there have been good catches in the Norwegian sector.

The Norwegian and Soviet views both agree with the recommendations of an expert committee of the International Council for Oceanic Research. The committee has put forward various alternatives: 122,000 tons would mean a rapid increase in the cod stocks, while 300,000 tons would mean that the stocks would not fall below their present level.

The Soviet Union takes the view that stocks are actually so bad that all cod fishing should be banned, but has nevertheless adopted the lowest quota proposed by the Oceanic Research Council.

Cod and capelin were discussed on Monday [15 November], and even though the prospects for capelin stocks are good, the Soviet Union wants a different division than the present one. This year, Norway has had almost 65 percent of capelin catches, although the agreement stipulates a 60-40 split. The Soviet Union wants this changed to a 50-50 division.

Another bone of contention, which has also been raised in the past, is Norway's unilateral increase in trawl net mesh size to 135 mm from 1 January. The new size will also apply to the Spitsbergen fishing zone, to which the Soviet Union has already expressed reservations on reasons of principle.

In the course of this week, the two sides will also discuss the state of the stocks of other species of fish in the Barents Sea. The talks yesterday morning started a little later than planned because of the funeral of Leonid Brezhnev in Moscow. He was honored with a 1-minute silence, and Soviet chief negotiator Vyatcheslav Silanov delivered a short memorial speech.

JOBERT ON FRENCH-SWEDISH TRADE PROSPECTS

[Jan Magnus Fahlstrom report: "Jobert Believes in French-Swedish Cooperation: Obstacles to Trade To Be Investigated"]

[Text] Swedish Foreign and Trade Minister Lennart Bodstrom and French Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert agreed on Thursday [11 November] to appoint a two-man committee to produce an urgent report on trade obstacles between the two countries. Jobert announced this at the end of his 2-day official visit to Stockholm, where he held talks with representatives of the Swedish Government and of Swedish industry and commerce.

The Swedish representative on the committee will be Foreign and Trade Ministry principal Assistant Secretary Nils-urban Allard. The French representative will be Betrand Schneiter of the Directorate for Foreign Economic Relations [direktionen foer ekonomiska utlandsferbindelser].

Michel Jobert, who on Wednesday visited Handelsbanken and on Thursday the Federation of Swedish Industry, later met Lennart Bodstrom and Prime Minister Olof Palme. Jobert was asked about the new French requirement that all documentation concerning goods imported into France must be written in French. Some Swedish circles have seen this as a form of protectionist intervention.

"It is more a moral question," Jobert said. "Everything which contributes to French being a living and respected language is good. Recently I went into a shop on the Champs Elysees and bought a German electric razor. The instructions were in German, Spanish and Japanese. I felt both consternation and humiliation. "Documents in French are also a way of making imports easier. You cannot expect the poor customs men to be able to speak a number of foreign languages. "I do not think that this requirement will create any difficulties for you -- apart from the first 2 weeks, and if you prefer documentation in Swedish for your imports, then we would have to arrange to produce it. It is simply a question of politeness."

When Jobert's Swedish hosts wanted to talk about trade obstacles, the French guest preferred to devote time to the prospects offered by expanded French-Soviet industrial cooperation. He mentioned the examples of space, aircraft and missile technology, telephones and the paper industry.

"France and Sweden should be able to lead the field in European industrial cooperation," Jobert said. "But swift action is important, we must be on the alert. A lot is happening which could harm both France and Sweden."

"But as far as foodstuffs are concerned, Sweden has adopted an isolationist attitude. Selling food to you is difficult. However, if we were only to give the Swedes something good to eat, then I believe that your authorities would have to give way. I have also talked about this to Pehr Gyllenhammar -- an excellent man who learned good French in a few months."

When asked how the French view the Swedish devaluation, Jobert expressed his doubts about whether it really is possible to deal with the effects of such a drastic devaluation.

"You have devalued the krona by 26 percent in a little over a year. Today, we are not feeling any beneficial effects from our own devaluations. But perhaps things will be different in Sweden. Your experiences will be of the greatest interest to us."

FOREIGN MINISTER BODSTROM ON NUCLEAR-FREE BALTIC

LD221304 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 22 Nov 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom said in the Riksdag today it is hoped that the Baltic can become nuclear-free, and that the submarines equipped with nuclear arms which are there now will leave the area. Bodstrom also said the Baltic must be included in arrangements concerning a nuclear-free zone in northern Europe. Owing to reasons linked to international law, the Baltic could probably not be included in the zone itself, Bodstrom pointed out. He also stressed that it is necessary to secure promises from the nuclear states that they withdraw those nuclear arms in the vicinity of the zone which could be intended for use against the Nordic countries.

UK ARMY CHIEF CITED ON HONG KONG DEFENSE PLANS

[Graham Earnshaw Beijing dispatch: "UK Plans for Defense of Hong Kong"]

[Text] Britain's Army chief, General Sir John Stanier, indicated in Hong Kong yesterday that contingency plans existed to defend the British colony from an attack by China, a statement certain to further anger the Beijing government.

Secret Sino-British talks on the future of Hong Kong are underway, but China has said repeatedly that it regards the colony as Chinese territory and intends to recover sovereignty over it no matter what.

"Obviously you do not have military forces anywhere in the world without making contingency plans, but it is not our policy to discuss these openly," he told a press conference.

Britain has five battalions based on Hong Kong, including about 5,000 Gurkhas from Nepal.

Asked if the troops would defend Hong Kong against a Chinese invasion, General Stanier said:

"The question is hypothetical, but you have got armed soldiers and in the defense cost-sharing agreement (between Hong Kong and London) Britain is prepared to maintain the integrity and security of the colony."

DAILY CLAIMS GREEK CYPRIOT CONCESSIONS IN MARCH

NC221013 Nicosia O ANEXARTITOS in Greek 22 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] A source in the U.S. State Department disclosed to Greek circles that the State Department expects new mobility in the Cyprus problem next March.

According to the source, the State Department has received assurances both from the Cypriot and the Turkish Governments in connection with permanent immobility and stagnation in the Nicosia talks. Both sides -- the source mentioned -- affirmed that there will be a new impetus to the talks in March (after the presidential elections). On the basis of these assurances the State Department expects both sides to submit new proposals in March, and it is aware that this is the decision of the Cypriot Government (which obviously is optimistic that Kiprianou will be reelected). Other NATO and EEC countries have been informed of this expected development.

Observers in the U.S. capital believe that Nicosia's assurance that new proposals will be submitted has been given in order to secure Western tolerance of the Kiprianou-AKEL cooperation. The Americans, who control Cyprus through Attila and the British bases -- according to the above observers -- consider the short-term tolerance of the Kiprianou-AKEL cooperation as a fair exchange for the new Greek-Cypriot concessions which will lead to the implementation of the U.S. plan as "amended" through the Waldheim evaluation. The same observers note in this connection that there has been no U.S. reaction to the Kiprianou-AKEL cooperation and that only extremist U.S. newspapers of little significance have criticized it, and only one, the insignificant WASHINGTON TIMES, reported it as... Cubanization.

It must be noted that according to Gobbi's statements, the progress of the talks depends on the political will of the two sides to make sacrifices. The government refuses to comment on this point.

Concessions Denied

NC230700 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 23 Nov 82 p 12

[Text] The Cyprus Government has no information that the Americans are working out a fresh "Camp David" on the Cyprus problem. This statement was made yesterday by the government spokesman who was answering a question on the subject. The government spokesman also described as unfounded, a report carried yesterday by a newspaper (not by O FILELEVTHEROS) that in exchange for U.S. tolerance of the AKEL-Democratic Party cooperation, President Kiprianou has promised Washington to make concessions next March during the intercommunal dialogue. This report, the government spokesman added, aims at creating a wrong impression.

When requested to comment yesterday on reports that Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis had said in London that the West will not allow President Kiprianou to stay in office with AKEL cooperation, the government spokesman said that the Cyprus Government does not have any such information or indication. The government spokesman said: If such a statement has been made by Mr Kliridhis, it is unacceptable.

PRINCE FAYSAL VISITS NORTH, DISCUSSES AID

[Text] Prince Faysal arrived in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus (TFSC) yesterday in his private plane. Answering questions from journalists at the Islamic Banking Institute, Prince Faysal stated that he had come to Cyprus to see what had been accomplished.

According to a TAK agency report, Prince Faysal stated that their aim is not merely to extend aid to the young [Turkish] Cypriot state, as temporary aid could not resolve the issues. Prince Faysal stressed that they would provide the basic contributions which are essential for the development of the economy, and added that through such activities they were trying to attract the attention of the Islamic countries to the TFSC. Prince Faysal further stated that the current contributions could be an example for this purpose.

Prince Faysal will continue his contacts and studies in the TFSC. He will leave the island on Sunday.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONFERENCE ENDS -- The work of the Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference, in which 75 ministers and other representatives from 26 countries participated, ended in Nicosia today. According to an official statement, the conferees agreed to recommend to their governments the replacement of the 1973 agreement of the Commonwealth Telecommunications Organization with new arrangements as of next April. These arrangements provide for greater flexibility to permit member governments to respond to changing economic and technological factors, while at the same time they will be far less expensive to implement. GOVERNMENT SETS UP PASOK EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT

NC221553 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 22 Nov 82 pp 1, 14

[Reportage by Stratis Zakhariadhis: 'Ultimatum To Be Issued to the Ministers Today"]

[Excerpt] The government is working to immediately implement the strict warnings and instructions of Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou at 1800 today, the "ultimatum" addressed to the members of the Ministerial Council will be transmitted "downward" to a meeting of the secretaries general of all the ministries to be held under the chairmanship of Koutsoyiorgas, minister to the prime minister. Meanwhile, the composition of a nine-member Executive Secretariat was announced yesterday, and the start of its operation is aimed at an extensive reorganization of PASOK's party apparatus.

Reports originating from a government -- as well as a party -- source, indicate that:

-- There is no prospect of a government reshuffle nor could this be considered barely 5 months after the government's restructuring.

-- The establishment and operation of the Executive Secretariat -- which, as mentioned, will have a broadly defined jurisdiction under the general supervison of the prime minister and PASOK's Executive Bureau -- became imperative primarily because of the inclusion of members of the Executive Bureau in the government.

-- This new organ, the establishment of which is provided for under PASOK's constitutional charter, will be responsible for the organizational structure of the movement with the [general] congress in view.

-- It has been resolved that PASOK's congress will be held in November 1983. The precongress preparations and the organization of the still broader mass-conversion of the movement fall within the purview of the Executive Secretariat. The goal is to register 250,000 members.

The nine members of the Executive Secretariat appointed pursuant to a decision by the prime minister and PASOK's Executive Bureau are: Menelaos Givalos; Deputy Iaonnis Koronaios; Mika Koutsilaiou-Koulami; Dhimitrios Pagoropoulos, chairman of PASOK's Disciplinary Council; Vaso Papandreou, member of PASOK's Central Committee; Khristos Papoutsis, member of PASOK's Central Committee; Ioannis Souladhakis, member of PASOK's Central Committee; Dhimitrios Sotirlis, member of PASOK's Central Committee; and Stefanos Tzoumakas, member of PASOK's Central Committee and a deputy.

The announcement of the functioning of the Executive Secretariat barely 48 hours after the warnings of Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou addressed both to the ministers and to the party to end interference with the government and the state apparatus is directly related to the "separation" of the movement and the government in parallel functions.

PAPER CLARIFIES PAPANDREOU REMARKS ON PARTY

NC221219 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 21 Nov 82 pp 1, 20

[Excerpt] According to an assessment by a government personality, the warnings Prime Minister A. Papandreou made over interventions in the government's task concerned a limited number of cadres from PASOK branch organizations. In reply to a question regarding the exploitation of his statements by the right's press and leadership -- New Democracy's leadership yesterday hastened to celebrate the fact that its charges had been confirmed -- the prime minister himself, in an exclusive statement to KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA, defined the true meaning of everything he had said at the Ministerial Council as follows:

"This is the first time in Greece's history that the government has promoted the correct relationship between a party and the government machinery for the purpose of establishing a state that will serve citizens and will belong to all the Greeks."

According to the assessment of a "front line" government personality, Papandreou's statements were not nor could they be an attack against the party's grassroots organizations, which have not attempted any interventions. The statements concerned instances of persons who have joined branch organizations -- especially after the elections -- with the intention to profit and benefit. More specifically, they concerned branch organizations which are directly connected with public administration -- public servants, banks and organizations.

On the contrary, the movement's great base, whether belonging to its local organizations or to the branch organizations for workers, employees, professionals and so forth, not only does not attempt any interventions, but consistently struggles against the spirit of favoritism and profiteering.

D. Maroudhas, deputy minister to the prime minister on press issues, yesterday had a clarifying discussion with political editors and stressed that the right's reaction is hypocritical because it knows very well that interventions in the administration -- actually blatant -- were made by it up to last year through its ministers, deputies and political bosses after it had turned the state into its partisan fief.

On the contrary -- Maroudhas said -- the PASOK government not only seeks to keep its party machine away from the state, but has also rid deputies of the anxiety of indirectly serving their political friends by abolishing the quest for votes.

K. Papakonstandinou, who is deputizing for the New Democracy chairman, made a statement yesterday in connection with everything Prime Minister A. Papandreou said to the Ministerial Council the day before yesterday stressing that:

"The time has come for the prime minister himself to note the unacceptable situation which has been created as a result of the interventions of PASOK's cadres and to refer to the "degenerative" symptoms in relations between the government and the party."

Papakonstandinou added that "the prime minister's dramatic appeal-warning gives a huge dimension to the acute political problem that has been created since 18 October 1981, and at the same time proves the truly difficult position into which the prime minister himself has been driven.

PAPER SCORES PAPANDREOU CABINET SPEECH

[By Stamos Zouas]

[Excerpts] According to assessments by political observers, the prime minister's self-criticism the other day before 52 ministers and deputy ministers had two aims: First, to further strengthen Mr Papandreou personally -- this time within his party machine -- and, second, to promote acceptance of a peculiar "policy of extraterritoriality" according to which the prime minister judges the government work but is not accountable for it. For the sake of promoting these two goals, Mr Papandreou decided that it was advisable to give, with sharp words and most revealing affirmations, a gloomy picture of the functioning of the state machinery during the 13 months that PASOK has been administrating power. And there is no doubt that this picture tends to confirm almost all the charges and facts pointed out by the opposition with regard to the state's partisanship, the persecution of opponents and the informal but decisive exercise of power by irresponsible partisan cadres and invincible "rank and file committees" which have flooded the state machinery. The sole question that stems from this unexpectedly sincere and catetorical self-criticism by the prime minister is whether Mr Papandreou's affirmations, instructions and threats will really lead to a radical purge of these elements from the state and to the restoration of the proper functioning of the government machinery, which completely lacks coordination.

The "degenerating symptoms" referred to by the prime minister in connection with the relations between the government and the [PASOK] movement are not "very few," nor have the cases of partisan interventions "occurred on a very small scale" -- as Mr Papandreou hastened to reaffirm for obvious reasons.

Besides, he himself refers to the escalation of interventions "for transfers, appointments or for any other administrative action" that covers the entire framework of administration; that is, "ministers, nomarchs, administrations of organizations and banks." At the same time, the prime minister charges that these interventions "undermine the people's unity" and hints that his declaration "We will be a government of all the Greeks" remains unfulfilled. And finally, he most strictly instructs his aides to contribute to the elimination of polarization which, for the first time, he notes as an existing post-electoral problem at the people's base.

Undoubtedly, these conclusions, along with the threat that ministers "will lose their posts" if they give in to similar partisan interventions in the future, provide the true dimension of the state of affairs that prevails in the state machinery, and renders ineffective the assurances that such cases until now have been "very few" and infrequent.

The goal of strengthening the prime minister's position within the party machine that is ascribed to the speech the other day becomes particularly important because it is promoted immediately after the enforcement of "iron discipline" on the parliamentary group with the abolition of the cross of preference and the well-known dismissal of deputies. According to current appraisals, Mr Papandreou now aims at an "omnipotence" that would allow him absolute freedom of maneuvering in the case of vital questions of internal and foreign policy.

There is no doubt that the seeking of omnipotence conflicts with the prime minister's second goal, that is, his dissociation from every case of bad administration or failure in the government task. As the opposition has pointed out, the prime minister's tendency "to raise himself above government responsibilities" and to pose as a judge of the administration of power by his party has been repeatedly demonstrated in the last 13 months of political change.

It is recalled in this connection that although Mr Papandreou entered politics as a distinguished economist, he has refrained from shouldering any direct responsibility in the economic field, which is today the most vital domestic problem as well as the main source of rapid political destruction. What is more, he himself has sought, in the course of the development of the economic crisis, to dissociate his position by denouncing leading cadres (Lazaris, Dhrettakis) who were dismissed from the government for having failed in their fields.

It is also noteworthy that Mr Papandreou has chosen from the specific fields of the state machinery the Ministry of National Defense, where a most important job has been carried out. Moreover, partisan differences over this ministry have been blunted, since the strengthening of national defense constitutes a point of unity and unanimity between people and the political leadership.

The seeking of a "political alibi" by the prime minister in connection with government deeds, and opposition quarters, becomes still more unfounded because of concentrationism and authoritarianism, which have been noted and which have been continuously intensified both within the government and the partisan structure of PASOK.

All these assessments make the official opposition quarters suspect that with his address to the Council of Ministers the other day, the prime minister aims -- in addition to strengthening his position within the party -- at safeguarding his personal prestige with the people's base. At the same time, there are doubts as to the desire and possibility for a real purge of the state machinery of the "partisan parasites."

It is maintained in particular that Mr Papandreou's reaction is mainly due to the "message" from the municipal elections that was manifested by a huge rallying together of the people against factionalization and the extensive persecution of the opponents of the government in all fields of public and private activity. The PASOK chairman probably believed that the inability of New Democracy to reorganize itself following its defeat in 1981 and to soon appear as a dangerous rival to PASOK would secure a long stay in power for his party. But for one to lose power it is not necessary that there be a dangerous contender. Many times failures in the administration of power begin the first substantive undercurrent for political change. And this is what has been proved by the municipal election results and the fresh correlation of powers between PASOK and New Democracy.

A prominent figure of our political life has quite characteristically pointed out: "It is obviously preferable for a party to have a problem of leadership than a problem of supporters."

NAVAL UNITS WATCH TURKISH EXERCISES IN AEGEAN

NC221627 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 22 Nov 82 p 14

[Excerpt] Greek naval units are closely watching the large-scale Turkish air and naval exercise which has been taking place since last Friday in the Aegean, specifically to the west and northwest of Limnos and Lesvos. According to a Greek military source, the exercise was a scheduled one and we have not been taken by surprise. The battle disposition of the exercise has been known to the Naval General Staff for over a month.

The positioning of Greek units opposite the Turkish units is mainly to foil any possible attempt to violate Greek territory. From the very first day of the exercise, the destroyer Apostolis, a torpedo boat and smaller naval units as well as at least one submarine have been in the Limnos-Lesvos area. Participating in the Turkish exercise -- codenamed Koral 82 -- in the Aegean are Air Force planes, surface vessels and submarines.

PAPER COMMENTS ON NEW AIRPORT IN NORTH CYPRUS

NC221115 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 21 Nov 82 p 20

[Excerpt] Nicosia, 21 Nov -- The Turks are building a new big airport in the Famagusta district. According to political circles in Nicosia, the airport being built is part of a plan under preparation to solve the Cyprus issue. This plan is being promoted by the United States in cooperation with Western governments. It will be revealed in mid-1983.

This plan includes the freeing of Famagusta, a number of villages in this district to the right of the old Nicosia-Famagusta road, and some villages in the Morphou area.

On the basis of this plan, the Tymbou Airport (8 miles from Nicosia and now being used by the Turks) will be abandoned in order to straighten the "borders" and thus satisfy a pertinent Turkish claim. The new airport is being built with U.S. funds and may also serve other U.S. plans.

TURKMEN DISCUSSES FOREIGN POLICY AT ASSEMBLY

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has recalled that the eastern Aegean islands were given to Greece on condition that they maintain a nonmilitary status, and that this point was clearly cited in the relevant agreements. He added: Greece must realize the importance and imperative nature of this point for Turkey's security, and it must fulfill these obligations stipulated by the treaties. No demagogy can save Greece from these obligations.

The Consultative Assembly approved the budget of the Foreign Ministry following today's debates. In a speech at the assembly, the foreign minister said that in order to put an end to the dangerous dimensions of the international situation, a true military balance must be ensured between the East and West, and all countries must pursue policies that remain loyal to their obligations in international relations.

Turkmen stressed that NATO's deterrent power was as important for Turkey's security as it was for world peace. He added that it was one of the basic elements of Turkey's foreign policy to contribute to maintaining the alliance's existence without losing any of NATO's power. Turkmen pointed that deterrence alone was not enought to protect peace, adding that it was necessary to continue international talks and meetings on the issues of detente and disarmament. The foreign minister said that Turkey sincerely wants the European disarmament conference to convene.

Turkmen pointed out that Turkey's strengthening and the modernization of its armed forces had become an urgent and important task not only for its own security, but for the establishment of peace and stability in the region. Turkmen added: We are engaged in positive cooperation with the United States for the solution of the problem. We are cooperating with the exclusive aim of implementing NATO's defense plans and developing our country's defense capability within the NATO framework. On this occasion, I would like to state clearly once again that the press reports to the effect that this cooperation might place additional responsibility on Turkey, beyond its NATO commitments, are untrue.

On Turkish-Greek relations, Turkmen charged that since the detente process began, Greece had pursued an attitude of reinforcing hostile feelings against Turkey among the Greek public. Turkmen said that with its distorted reasoning, the Greek Government could not fool anyone but itself and was bound to be disillusioned. He added that behaving with a minimum amount of political maturity would be to the benefit of Greece.

Turkmen also stressed that the current Greek-American talks on military cooperation had nothing to do with Turkish-Greek bilateral problems. He then said that the increased military activity in the Greek Cypriot sector was being carefully observed. He added that the Greek Government and the Greek Cypriot leadership had a historic opportunity now to stop their activities that run counter to the efforts to reach a peaceful solution to the problem and to support the intercommunal talks.

Turkmen noted that very positive developments were achieved in Turkey's foreign economic relations during the past 2 years, and that the rigidity in the EEC's attitude toward Turkey would be eliminated with Turkey's transition to democracy. He added that the determined progress of a secure Turkey toward a pluralistic parliamentary democracy was eliminating the difficulties being encountered in relations with certain countries and organizations.

VOTCP DOUBTS IMPROVEMENT IN RELATIONS WITH USSR

TA191121 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 19 Nov 82

[Station commentary: "Turkish-Soviet Relations and What It Means To Honor Your Words"]

[Text] Bulent Ulusu, the prime minister of the junta government, and Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen have been in Moscow to participate in the Brezhnev funeral. In a statement before his departure for Moscow, Ulusu said that he would attend the funeral on behalf of President Evren and the Turkish people, adding that Brezhnev was a prominent and respected statesman and had played an important and historic role in world politics for the last 18 years. Ulusu continued: Brezhnev has made valuable contributions to the state of good neighborliness, friendship and cooperation in the current relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union.

Dear listeners, on his return from Moscow, Ulusu said that he held a useful meeting with Soviet Premier Nikolay Tikhonov which contributed to the goodneighborly and friendly relations between the two countries based on the principles of mutual respect and noninterference in each other's internal affairs. In expressing his wish for the development of relations between the two countries, was Ulusu expressing his genuine convictions? We do not think so, dear listeners, because the foreign policies being pursued by the Evren dictatorship during the last 2 years do not justify these statements.

On the contrary, a policy which is subordinate to U.S. policies hostile to the Soviet Union is being pursued step-by-step by the Ulusu government. Turkey has said Yes to NATO plans aimed at the destruction of the Soviet Union in a nuclear war to be waged by U.S. imperialism -- the boss of that alliance. The junta government has conceded to the deployment of U.S. missiles in Western Europe. As if there were not enough U.S. bases on our soil, new bases are being provided against the Soviet Union and [words indistinct]. The stationing of U.S. troops of the Rapid Deployment Forces [RDF] is being allowed.

Let the junta deny it, but it is obvious that Turkey is becoming a tool of U.S. imperialist plots. Recently, the Saudi Arabian newspaper AR-RIYADH reported that reinforced U.S. RDF troops will be stationed in Turkey. All this proves, dear listeners, that the Evren dictatorship is not allowing a policy of relations of good friendship and goodneighborliness with the Soviet Union. It is not very difficult to see why. So far, no constructive reply has been given to peaceful propositions made by the Soviet Union. Reacting to the Greek proposal of transforming the Balkans into a nuclear free zone -- a proposal supported by the Soviet Union -- the Foreign Ministry of the junta government made this statement: If the Balkans are transformed into a nuclear free zone, then the balance in the area will be upset. This stand can only mean supporting U.S. imperialism's positions despite the national interests of our country.

There is another peace proposal made by the Soviet Union. This proposal asks for the Meditterranean to be cleared of nuclear submarines. The junta again refused to support this proposal. Let us give more examples. Another Soviet peace proposal which closely interests our country is the promise that no nuclear arms will be used against countries that have no nuclear arms. What was the military junta's reaction to that proposal? It turned a deaf ear to it. However, it is well-known that our country has been transformed into a U.S. nuclear arsenal. Our country will be the first one destroyed in the event of a nuclear war. The military junta and the Evren dictatorship are not even concerned about this. They prefer the interests of the U.S. imperialism to our national interests.

That is why we questioned Ulusu's statements on relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union. Our answer to this question was negative and we have explained why, dear listeners. Unfortunately, Evren, Ulusu and Turkmen are opposed to the promotion of our relations with the Soviet Union which are in fact beneficial for our country, and which are supported by our people. What they want is to be subjugated blindly to U.S. imperialism instead of maintaining relations of friendship and goodneighborliness with the Soviet Union. The foreign policies being pursued by them are not prepared in Ankara but in Washington.

There is a well-known expression in Turkish used by the military about honoring your word. Though both Ulusu and Evren have reached the highest ranks in the armed forces, they have not honored their word. On the one hand, they speak about relations of friendship and goodneighborliness with the Soviet Union; on the other, they try to plot against that country through U.S. support. Such a stand is not becoming to soldiers.

REAGAN MX DEPLOYMENT DECISION RECEIVES PRAISE

DW241129 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 24 Nov 82 p 12

[Commentary signed Ein.]

[Text] The decision has been made. President Reagan wants the MX missile weapons system deployed in a clustered manner. Thus, he has followed the Pentagon's proposal. The MX is to become the strategic counterbalance to the Soviet long-range weapons. Just as the Russian SS-18, each MX missile carries 10 warheads. Electronically guided, these warheads can simultaneously hit 10 different targets. Consequently, the MX must be considered a weapon which will restore the strategic balance that has changed to the advantage of the Soviets. So far, Congress has not yet approved the system and the White House is facing a difficult struggle over the funding and the type of technical bases. Nevertheless, the President has made it clear that he is serious about his struggle to regain strategic parity. The Europeans are acting differently. While the political elite in the United States are pursuing a firm course, the Scandinavians, for example, are constantly growing weaker in Atlantic defense policy. Denmark and Norway have come out against the Pershing II and advocate a "nuclear freeze." Just the same, they want to retain high positions in NATO. Security policy simply cannot be pursued in a more contradictory manner.

Negative Reaction

[Commentary by Washington correspondent Fritz Pleitgen in the "Tagesthemen" Program]

[Text] Washington and Moscow have again come out with basic statements on world peace, and again they hold fundamentally divergent views on the matter. I don't intend to deny the desire for peace on the part of the Reagan administration, yet one may well disagree with this administration's peace strategy. It is demanding that the Soviets change their behavior. Unfortunately, the Soviets hold the view that the Americans are behaving badly. If better behavior by the other party is made a precondition for initiatives toward an improvement in mutual relations, then the day of confrontation is not far off.

True enough, negotiations on strategic and medium-range weapons are under way in Geneva. However, nothing positive will happen there until the relationship between Washington and Moscow fundamentally improves. Does anyone seriously believe that the Soviets are willing to make military concessions if the screws are put to them economically? Or has history proved that Moscow grants more liberties to dissidents when proper pressure is brought to bear from outside? The opposite has been true.

Now Ronald Reagan has publicly announced his decision on the deployment of MX missiles. He calls this weapon a peace-keeper because, he says, it will deter the Soviets from adventures with disastrous consequences. Moscow calls the MX an instrument of nuclear aggression.

It would certainly be more advantageous to world peace if the Soviets would also place their cards faceup on the table. The Americans take a different approach. They are thinking aloud about an antimissile system. Well, in the Nixon and Brezhnev eras, it was agreed that the very establishment of these systems would lead to an unrestrained arms race. It is not hard to imagine that following the public contemplations on the part of the Americans, the Soviet military are now working on similar devices.

There is yet another problem. In the opinion of many experts in Washington, the MX constitutes a violation of SALT II. This agreement, which so far has been respected even though it has not been ratified, prohibits extra launching pads for intercontinental missiles. Weinberger says that the MX does not create this problem. How do you think the Soviet military people feel about this and what do you think they are secretly doing about it? Yuriy Andropov certainly did not come to power against the will of the military, and he thus will hardly be able to be the first to make compromises. On the other hand, Washington is not giving him the benefit of a settling in period.

No matter where we look prospects are gloomy, especially for the Germans, who are sitting right in the middle. If they care about their destiny, they'll have to put in a determined word -- in Washington as well as in Moscow.

WOERNER DISPELS DOUBTS ABOUT U.S. STRATEGY

DW231207 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 2110 GMT 22 Nov 82

[Interview with Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner by correspondent Harenberg; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Former politicians, American congressmen, and U.S. military men have repeatedly pointed out that in the United States -- and especially in the present administration -- there is a trend of thought which departs from the original concept of deterrence, that is, from a concept aimed solely at preventing war. Now there is the concept of a nuclear war which can be waged over a long period and won.

[Answer] To begin with, I want to make the Federal Government's stand very clear. We are not interested in either nuclear or conventional war. Quite the contrary. We will make every effort to prevent nuclear and conventional war.

We are interested not in waging, but in preventing war. We would never -- I say never, and I emphasize this -- accept a strategy which is tantamount to the concept of waging a prolonged nuclear war in Europe, and I can reassure you that the current U.S. administration has no such plans.

Some of my talks in Washington centered on this point, and I have returned with the absolutely firm conviction that the Americans are neither planning nor intending to develop a nuclear warfare strategy here in Europe. Just as we do, they want to deter the Soviet Union from using nuclear weapons. The study that was made there is entirely aimed at making it clear to the Soviets that it would be madness to wage war -- nuclear or conventional -- here in Europe.

It is the Soviets and not the Americans who are the inventors of a concept of a winnable nuclear war. The Americans' study merely makes it clear to the Soviets that they have no chance of waging and winning a localized nuclear war in Europe or anywhere else. In this regard, the Americans have consistently thought along the lines of a preventative strategy.

The contemplations by General Rogers, who is seeking a strengthening of the conventional component, are fully within the framework of the appropriate strategy of flexible response. This strategy forms the basis of the present governmental policy just as it formed that of the former policy. We don't need any other strategy. However, we must make the present strategy more credible and flexible.

For this reason, I share Rogers' view that it is necessary for us, in keeping with our financial capabilities and commensurate with the technical development of modern conventional weapons, to exploit all opportunities to improve our options for defence and deterrence in this field.

GENSCHER SCHEDULES VISIT TO HUNGARY 26 NOV

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is to fly to Budapest on Friday for a 2-day official visit to the Hungarian People's Republic. Genscher has been invited by his Hungarian counterpart, Frigyes Puja, who visited the Federal Republic 2 years ago.

ECONOMIC EXPERTS PREDICT SLIGHT ECONOMIC UPTURN

[Excerpt] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- The council of experts for the assessment of overall economic trends is adhering to its forecast that there could be a slight economic upturn during the coming year. In their annual report presented to Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl today, the "five wise men" still expect, as stated in their special October report, a 1-percent increase in real growth of the national product.

At the same time, the five independent professors, who advise the Federal Government, renew their demand for lower wage agreements in coming years. They express skepticism, however, with regard to the proposal by Federal Labor Minister Norbert Bluem (CDU) that a 6-month wage freeze should be agreed upon. If individual branches or workers or employers in different regions were to agree on postponing new wage agreements for a time, this would have a more favorable effect than a general wage freeze.

In the medium term, the "five wise men" regard gradual tax reductions of DM10-15 billion as necessary in view of the continuing high unemployment in the Federal Republic in order to stimulate investment. Since public money is in short supply at present, these tax alleviations, which could be financed from the proceeds of value added tax, should not be suddenly introduced, but rather, on a gradual basis.

ARREST WARRANT ISSUED FOR POLISH HIJACKER

[Excerpt] Berlin, 23 Nov (DPA) -- An arrest warrant on the charge of an attack on air traffic was issued today against 22-year old Polish policeman Piotr W., who hijacked a Polish passenger aircraft on a domestic flight to West Berlin yesterday. The hijacker, who was armed with two pistols and two hand grenades, had been detailed at short notice by the Polish authorities to protect the aircraft against a hijacking.

After forcing the plane to land at the U.S. military airport of Berlin-Tempelhof, the hijacker was involved in an exchange of fire with two other security officials in which he was shot in the right foot. Out of "consideration for any relatives in Poland," the spokesman declined to give the hijacker's full name.

The decision of the responsible U.S. authorities not to allow Berlin police officers to question the two security men was described as unsatisfactory today in police and judiciary circles. A U.S. spokesman said in this connection that following "careful evaluation of all available information," it was decided "in the interests of a rapid conclusion to this incident to allow all persons who wish to return by air to Poland." Agreement was also reached with the Polish authorities that they would thoroughly investigate the behavior of the two security officials and "reach an appropriate verdict."

In contrast to the passengers and crew, the two men had refused to leave the aircraft. According to a judiciary spokesman, the state prosecutor's office suspected one of them of attempted manslaughter.

TRIAL ON PROCUREMENT OF TANK STEEL FOR USSR

LD231916 Hamburg DPA in German 1511 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] Dusseldorf, 23 Nov (DPA) -- The procurement of steel plate alloys for Marder and Leopard Bundeswehr tanks for the Soviet Union is at the center of an espionage trial which began today before the Fifth Criminal Bench of the Dusseldorf Higher Regional Court. A 45-year old mechanical engineer and a 38-year old ultrasound tester from Bochum are said to have procured sheet metal for tanks from West German arms firms up until their arrest in October 1981 and to have supplied it to the Soviet Union. Both the accused have, in general, confessed.

The mechanical engineer, who has been held in custody, was arrested in October 1981. He had surrendered 9 weeks earlier to the constitution protection authorities because his work as an agent had become too "risky." In the view of the public prosecutor, the accused, who fled from the GDR in 1957, had also been receiving training there since 1967 as a radio operator and long-term agent so that he could be deployed as an information communicator in the event of a crisis. The 38-year old codefendant is said to have procured steel plate for tanks for the agent since 1976.

PAPER LAUDS REAGAN SUPPORT OF FREE WORLD TRADE

[Jens Eckhardt commentary]

[Text] "Free trade not only serves economic progress but also world peace. When governments become too deeply involved in trade, economic costs rise and political controversy multiplies. This would be a danger to peace." In these unmistakable terms, U.S. President Ronald Reagan dealt with the subject of trade in his latest radio speech which, in view of the GATT ministers conference scheduled to open in Geneva this week, is dominating the headlines. Like everything else connected with foreign countries, trade is of little interest, if not downright suspicious, to the average American. The propaganda of the trade unions and of leading Democrats, according to which imports are responsible for the decline of key U.S. industries and thus must be barred by protectionist legislation, has so far fallen on the fertile soil of ignorance.

Prior to the GATT conference, the Reagan administration -- from White House trade representative William Brock up to the President himself -- has been making an extremely great effort to enlighten the citizens about the significance of free trade -- the very citizens who are highly satisfied with their Sony television sets, Nikon cameras and Toyota cars, and who simultaneously consider protectionism to be patriotic. In the meantime, they have learned that the United States exports 8.5 percent of its gross national product and nearly one-quarter of its industrial production annually, and that in more than one-fifth of the states of the union, more than 15 percent of all jobs depend on exports.

It was above all the U.S. Government which comprehended these statistical data, and it deserves great respect for undertaking a crusade for free trade in the face of growing protectionism in Congress. However, the tightrope on which it walks is rather narrow.

LATE REPORT: COMMENTATOR CALLS FOR MX HALT

[Commentary signed Mac]

[Text] Militarily dubious and politically dangerous -- this is the short formula to which the assessment of the plans of U.S. President Ronald Reagan concerning the "dense pack" deployment of new nuclear intercontinental missiles in the U.S. State of Wyoming can be reduced. To begin with, the United States already has about 9,000 warheads on land and sea-based intercontinental missiles; for example, on Minuteman III, Poseidon C4 and Trident missiles. In this connection it is primarily the long-range weapons on submarines which represent the "second strike capability." This capability is sufficient to annihilate an enemy even if it decided to make a "first strike" against U.S. territory, including the missile sites. Thus, the new MX would only increase the nuclear potential without any discernable military necessity.

Second, the "dense-pack" method of deployment, which provides a secure defense, merely provokes a further arms race. The Soviets will not hesitate to further develop their nuclear potential so it will also be suitable for use against the MX. Finally, what could we still expect from negotiations on the reduction of medium-range missiles if a new and gigantic race with intercontinental missiles was in the offing?

It is now up to the U.S. Congress to stop Reagan's dangerous plans by blocking the funds.

OVERVIEW OF MITTERRAND INTERVIEW TO CAIRO RADIO

NC232158 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 2100 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] French President Francois Mitterrand has given an interview to our correspondent in Paris, Dr 'Ali as-Samman.

Answering a question about his visit to Egypt, President Mitterrand said he is happy about his visit to Egypt because he will be meeting with Egyptian President Husni Mubarak, who plays an important role not only in Egypt but also in the international arena and in this sensitive area of the Middle East. He added that the high standards of the Egyptian political leadership prompts him to say that this visit will be successful.

Asked about the cooperation between Egypt and France, President Mitterrand said: Egypt is unlike the other Third World states because it has its resources, manpower and natural resources. Regarding military cooperation, he said: The great capacities of France in this respect provide an opportunity and open the door for this cooperation. Concerning economic cooperation, the door is open for it and the ministers concerned will cooperate in this regard.

Answering a question about France's relationship with the Third World, President Mitterrand said: France has fulfilled its commitments to the Third World within the limits of its capacities, whereas many large industrial states have reneged on what they should have done for the Third World. He added: Helping the Third World states is in the interest of the industrial states because helping the Third World states to produce increases their ability to consume. He added that this is a moral obligation toward these states, which we must fulfill. The French president advised increasing the IMF capacities in order to help the Third World states.

Regarding Jordan's role and his meeting with King Husayn, President Mitterrand said Jordan's role in the coming stage is very important, that he shares many of the opinions of the king and that Jordan has a special position by virture of its knowledge of the Palestinian people and by virtue of the fact that it is a neighbor of the two parties to the conflict.

Regarding a solution to the Middle East crisis, the French president said that he naturally supports the peoples' right to determine their future and the states' rights to recognition.

Concerning King Fahd's plan, the president said it is a positive step. Regarding the Reagan plan, he said it opens the door. Regarding the Fes summit resolutions, he said they are a step forward. He added that the Egyptian-French plan, which was submitted to the United Nations, does not compete with these plans but complements them.

Concerning the world economic crisis, President Mitterrand said he hopes that man's intelligence and the world leadership's ability will be able to surmount the current crisis.

At the end of his interview, President Mitterrand addressed a greeting to the Egyptian people, saying it is a greeting from the heart and the mind and that when he comes to Egypt, he will feel the ray of light linking its past with its present.

CHEYSSON ON NAMIBIA, GAS PIPELINE, NUCLEAR ARMS

AB231320 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 0900 GMT 23 Nov 82

["Second and last part" of French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's address to the National Assembly's budgetary session in Paris on 17 November]

[Excerpts] Yes, we powerfully contributed to save Beirut by convincing the PLO to evacuate the Palestinian combatants. Yes, this was only possible because of French intervention. Who among you has just declared that France has no authority anywhere and cannot change events? We changed events in Beirut. We therefore reaffirm these principles in all circumstances. I have just returned from Kuwait, where I had the opportunity to restate our position with regard to the Iraq-Iran war, which so disturbs us. I again appeal to the Iranian people to cease now that the borders delineated by the 1975 Algiers compromise have been attained.

We said the same thing everywhere. We say it in Africa, and this was demonstrated by our intervention in the liberation of the Namibian people and the evacuation of Namibia by South Africa. I confirm to Mr Montdargent that the application of the UN resolution is now extremely important. The discussions are continuing. The contact group has nearly completed its work. Only one difficulty remains to which we are trying to find a solution, and we are very much encouraged in this enterprise by all of Black Africa, which in this matter has accorded us its complete confidence.

We must continue to condemn the abusive overarmament still going on in Eastern Europe, which poses a direct threat to us through the overdevelopment of the most modern weapons which are not designed to cross the Atlantic. This over-armament, which destroys what Brzezinski called "the ambiguous equivalence of powers" between East and West, poses a grave problem to all the Western European countries.

This does not hinder us from trying to maintain technical, scientific and economic relations with the Soviet Union. We will continue to maintain and develop these relations even when they are in the mutual interest, and in any case, in our interest, provided they do not strengthen the defense capability of the leader of the alliance opposed to the one to which we belong. This determination was reaffirmed in Moscow during the ceremonies which marked the funeral of Mr Brezhnev.

The Siberian gas pipeline is a very clear example. France needs Soviet gas. This forms part of its policy of independence and energy diversification. We want gas to occupy 13 percent of our energy consumption. We agree to let Soviet oil occupy five percent of all our enery requirements. In these conditions, we can receive gas from the Soviet Union without danger and without any resulting dependence for us. Since we are to buy the gas, we are naturally interested in supplying equipment for the construction of the gas pipeline in proportion to what we are going to buy. We were therefore obliged to oppose the unilateral embargo our greatest ally proclaimed and the sanctions which it later imposed against two French companies as well as other European companies, and whose effects could cause great damage to our economy. Do people realize that this embargo would have represented 10,000 additional unemployed persons in Europe? We continued to protest against this measure, we demanded and later insisted that since they were adopted unilaterally, they should also be lifted in the same way. This has now been done.

Some renowned American personalities like McNamara and McGeorge Bundy are now talking about the need not to be the first to use nuclear arms. It is true that the American Government has not gone this far, but the commander in chief of the NATO forces did not hesitate to talk about the rejection of the "premature" utilization of nuclear arms. Technically, this can be perfectly understood, but politically it can produce formidable effects on public opinion, which has not been sufficiently informed about the discussion mentioned by Mr Duraffour. How many Germans take these declarations to mean that America will intervene only after (?their country) has been crushed? [Passage indistinct] I will not hide from this assembly that the uneasiness we sense in our German neighbor -- who together with us constitutes the pillar of Europe -- is one of the reasons why we completed the application of the Elysee treaty by deciding to introduce a regular Franco-German strategic consultation. This implies neither a transfer of technology nor the placing of any new means whatsoever at the disposal of our neighbor. There will be no changes in the measures adopted by the Germans in the framework of the integrated NATO system or by us outside this framework, but only the desire to exchange our views and to compare our methods of action.

SECOND FINANCE BILL ADOPTED, ALLOCATIONS NOTED

LD232156 Paris Domestic Service in French 2100 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] At the Council of Ministers session this afternoon, the second finance bill for 1982 was adopted. The deficit this year will be in line with the forecasts by Laurent Fabius, slightly below Fr 100 billion, or to be exact, 98.9 billion. Included in this figure is a new allocation of Fr 1 billion to the SNCF [state railways], an allocation of an extra Fr 5 billion to public and industrial enterprises and an increase in equipment credits for defense of Fr 6000 million.

LE MONDE VIEWS PROSPECTS FOR SUPERPOWER TIES

[Editorial: "Toward a 'New Departure' Between the Two Superpowers?"]

[Text] Should Leonid Brezhnev's death be the signal for a resumption of East-West dialogue on new bases? That seemed to be the view held by Mr Arbatov, Soviet expert on the United States, who said that the new Kremlin leadership intends to "carefully weigh each sign" indicating a change in U.S. diplomacy.

It is rather as if the new leaders, thinking that they have done enough in getting rid of an old ultraconservative leader, now think that the ball, to use the customary expression, is in the partner's "court" and that he is expected to "react" in the appropriate way....

That rather simplistic approach is clearly not to Washington's taste. Secretary of State Shultz said at a press conference Thursday that it is the United States which expects a "change of behavior" from its adversary, or at the very least, "will to discuss" the problems, especially since, according to him, "it is they who created them". For its part, U.S. policy continues to be directed toward strengthening defense and introducing the "political dimension" into East-West economic relations.

In that connection, the secretary of state was particularly nonchalant about France, stating that the important thing now is "to stop discussing whether an agreement was or was not reached (among the allies on trade relations with the USSR, which Paris disputes) and to begin implementing that agreement."

The TASS agency immediately criticized that statement, which it regards as "unacceptable pressure," the "continuation of the confrontation policy" and a "smokescreen intended to conceal the refusal to normalize relations with the Soviet Union."

Does this mean that the last word has been said? The U.S. side is scarcely concealing the fact that the decision to send Vice President Bush to Moscow for Brezhnev's funeral, the visit which Mr Reagan and his wife made to the Soviet Embassy in Washington (a gesture which Mrs Thatcher, for instance, refused to make) and even the lifting of the embargo on the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline can all be regarded as "gestures" toward the new Soviet leadership.

On the Soviet side, note should be taken of the warm welcome given in Moscow to 250 American businessmen -- who have been joined by several congressmen. Mr Andropov has not received the group -- which Mr Brezhnev had done 4 years ago -- but Mr Tikhonov, the government chief, told the group that the desire expressed by Mr Reagan to improve his relations with Moscow "corresponds to the Soviet Union's wishes and intentions."

It is true that at present no major diplomatic exchange is planned and the only visit which has been announced is Mr Gromyko's visit to Bonn next January. But it would be very surprising if in the next few months the two superpowers do not revitalize the very slow dialogue they have been pursuing for a year.

NORWAY

NORWAY UNLIKELY TO VOTE FOR WORLD NUCLEAR FREEZE

PM241139 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 22 Nov 82 p 8

[Unattributed report: "Unwilling To Freeze Imbalance"]

[Excerpt] "It is natural for the government to want to give priority to reducing the numbers of nuclear arms and not to a freeze of the existing imbalance, at least as far as medium-range weapons in Europe are concerned," Norwegian Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Eivinn Berg said, commenting on a proposal that the United Nations adopt a resolution for a freeze on nuclear arsenals in the world. Sweden and Mexico are among the countries behind the proposal.

Berg said that the Foreign Ministry had only just received the text and is working on it. Until the plan has been evaluated at the political level and the government has consulted other Western allies, Berg is unwilling to give a detailed answer on how Norway will vote.

There is good reason to believe that Norway will follow the NATO recommendation and vote against it, because the proposal would mean freezing the Soviet Union's superiority in land-based medium-range missiles in Europe.

SWEDEN

EAST-WEST TRADE DEPENDS ON MORE THAN PIPELINE

PM231119 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 18 Nov 82 p 2

[Per Jonsson editorial: "East-West Trade -- Not Only Gas"]

[Text] Throughout the fall, many people have been waiting for what could reasonably be expected to happen -- that Ronald Reagan's White House would renounce its embargo policy against the Siberian natural gas pipeline. In particular, there has been increasing pressure on the United States to lift the export ban on gas pipeline components manufactured using U.S. technology, which have primarily affected West European firms. If Reagan had refused to give way on this point, there was a serious risk that cooperation within NATO might have been jeopardized.

It is possible that this consideration had an effect on Reagan's decision to lift the sanctions against the gas pipeline on the eve of West Germany Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl's visit to the United States this week. Kohl is a key figure within the Western alliance. Nowadays the Bonn Government's active involvement is a must for all of NATO's more important initiatives, and West Germany is the nation for which disturbances in the construction of the gas pipeline and East-West trade in general are most problematic.

It is possible that Brezhnev's death and/or Lech Walesa's release had an effect on the choice of the timing for an end to the gas pipeline embargo, although Reagan himself has refused to accept such linking. Although to do so would not have done any harm.

Instead, Reagan wanted to primarily give the impression that the United States and its allies had reached "fundamental agreement" on a "plan of action" for East-West trade which would replace the sanctions against the pipeline. However, France was swift and vociferous in its protests against such an interpretation, and the White House was forced to give the assurance that the U.S. decision was unilateral -- without any reciprocal concessions from Western Europe.

Is there any settlement at all between the United States and Western Europe? Yes, to "study further" the best way to conduct business with the Soviet Union. However, the Western alliance has been in agreement on this since the Reagan administration's accession to office. Since the U.S. extension of the gas pipeline embargo this summer, it has in fact been the West Europeans who have tried to save the White House's face by means of a common formula for East-West trade. What they are trying to achieve is a sort of streamlining of the Western nations' export restrictions on so-called strategic products and the terms of credits for the Eastern bloc. In addition, the West Europeans are willing to think twice before any possible new gas purchase agreements with the Soviet Union.

None of this is fundamentally different from Western Europe's former trading policy with the Soviet Union. Although the gas pipeline conflict has been set aside for the time being, it does reveal that East-West trade can be a source of disturbing transatlantic discord.

And it will probably remain so. Economic exchanges between COMECON and Western Europe continue to grow (by 5-10 percent this year), at the same time as world trade has remained constant and trade between the United States and the Soviet Union has almost ceased (with the exception of grain). What the U.S.-sanctions, the Poland crisis and Eastern Europe's payment difficulties have chiefly led to is increased Soviet dominance within COMECON's foreign dealings. Even in an ailing world economy, there still seems to be room for Soviet raw material exports (which rose by all of 25 percent in the first half of 1982). At the same time, the Soviet Union is taking on itself a growing number of the credits needed to finance the Eastern bloc's debts and insatiable need to import technology and industrial products.

It hardly comes as a surprise that a sanctions policy at odds with market forces works badly. However, it is not only economic self-interest which lies behind the West Europeans' skepticism over sanctions against the Soviet Union with political objectives.

Many voices have also been raised against the White House's obvious intention of making economic warfare a trial of strength between East and West to try to hasten what the Reagan men seem to see as the Soviet Union's imminent economic collapse. To a certain extent, the West Europeans have a stronger belief in the Soviet System's ability to withstand economic isolation. Above all, the West Europeans do have to continue living side by side with the Russians. Better then to try to "tie them up" in peaceful commerical exchange than to threaten and stir them up into desperation.

Perhaps the most important lesson to be learned from the gas pipeline controversy, therefore, is that the Europeans within NATO will now reserve the right for themselves to define their own vital interests. As French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson put it: "We are an alliance, not a bloc." This lesson is perhaps a painful one for the U.S. superpower, but it could greatly benefit security and prosperity in the West and in the East.

THATCHER SUPPORTS REAGAN'S MX MISSILE DECISION

LD231656 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1626 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] The prime minister today gave full backing to President Reagan's decision to order concentrated deployment of the new generation MX nuclear missile. Mrs Thatcher flatly rejected claims by Labour leader Michael Foot, during Commons question time, that the decision breached the SALT 2 arms limitation treaty, and would escalate the arms race. "The United States is perfectly entitled to take steps to modernise the programme of its own strategic nuclear force," she said. "That was what the announcement about the MX intercontinental ballistic missile was." "I don't accept it would necessarily undercut the SALT agreements. One should remember it was President Reagan who made proposals about disarmament -- and we're waiting for a response from the Soviet Union."

Mr Foot condemned the deployment as a serious breach of SALT 2. He demanded whether Mrs Thatcher had made representations on the decision -- "or don't you care whether the nuclear arms race goes ahead at a much faster speed?"

The Prime Minister replied: "I care that we have sufficient to deter an aggressor. [sentence as received] That means keeping the U.S. strategic nuclear force modernised. It means having to reply to intercontinental ballistic missiles, and having regard to the level of conventional armed forces."

Mrs Thatcher stressed: "It is not for us to tell the United States what to do about its strategic nuclear force. It is for them to recognize that their strategic nuclear force is the final guarantor of Europe's liberty". Mrs Thatcher told Mr Foot that Labour's unilateralist policy would not have a hope of achieving arms reduction -- and she endorsed the recent attack on the policy by former Labour Premier James Callaghan. "No one should expect the Soviet Union to disarm unilaterally. We are not naive people. I hope this will not be lost on the unilateralists," Mrs Thatcher said.

Later an opposition defence spokesman, Denzil Davies, told reporters that President Reagan's decision to deploy the MX missiles in an "horrendous nuclear basket" demonstrated how "absurd, ridiculous and dangerous the nuclear arms race has become." A meeting was needed between President Reagan and Mr Andropov. "Unless they get together soon, there is a real danger we will all end up in a nuclear war."

THATCHER AGAINST FALKLANDS SOVEREIGNTY TALKS

LD231730 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1648 GMT 21 Nov 82

[Text] The prime minister today flatly ruled out the prospect of future negotiations on the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands.

"There can be no question of negotiating on the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands. It would be a betrayal of those who fought and died," she said in the Commons at question time. Mrs Thatcher sidestepped a challenge on claims in a recently published book that she had sent three Royal Navy submarines to the South Atlantic days before the invasion. Questioned on the book, writted by Fleet Street journalists Max Hastings and Simon Jenkins, she told a Labour MP: "I haven't read it. I have been too busy doing other things."

PAPER REVIEWS PAPANDREOU-PAPAIOANNOU TALKS

[Editorial: "Sincere Cooperation"]

[Text] The meeting held the day before yesterday between Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou at Kastri undoubtedly was useful and fruitful. The meeting was held at a time when the Cyprus issue is in a crucial phase and a new Greek foreign policy is being formulated under the PASOK administration. As was natural, the Greek prime minister and the leader of the greatest Cypriot party fully assessed the present situation in the Cyprus issue, evaluated the latest developments and appraised the prospects that are being outlined for the effective promotion of our cause. The two leaders also discussed other problems in the area which are directly connected with or influence the Cyprus issue.

Of course, all the matters discussed could not be exhausted in one meeting; new developments related to our problem are continuously occurring, consequently, it was deemed necessary that such contacts are essential in the future in order to brief each other and coordinate joint action on the Cyprus issue. We are certain that the content of the Papandreou-Papaioannou talks as well as the warm, cordial atmosphere that prevailed during the meeting of the two politicians will contribute to the further broadening of Athens-Nicosia cooperation on the Cyprus issue -- particularly in the international arena -- as well as on other issues that concern our area. We can say after the meeting that the Greece-Cyprus alignment is being further strengthened. Mr Papandreou and the AKEL leadership have repeatedly stressed that they attach tremendous importance to this alignment for a fair, peaceful and lasting solution of the Cyprus issue.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES NEW FINNISH AMBASSADOR

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou has underlined that the time has ripened for a new and decisive effort on the part of all and within the UN framework to restore the full freedom, independence, territorial integrity and unity of Cyprus.

Accepting the credentials of the new Finnish ambassador to Cyprus Erkki (Martikaiken) President Kiprianou stressed that the Turkish occupation troops must withdraw and the basic and inalienable rights of Cypriot citizens be restored.

The president of the republic stated that only under conditions of full freedom and unity of the country and the people will we be able to reach our goal, which is to turn Cyprus into an area of happiness and prosperity. President Kiprianou then expressed his appreciation for Finnish participation in the UN Peace Force in Cyprus and for its participation in the efforts to preserve peace on the island.

Concluding, President Kiprianou referred to relations between the two countries which, he said, are excellent. He also referred to Cypriot-Finnish cooperation within the framework of the UN and the Madrid Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

DISAGREEMENTS REPORTED BETWEEN AKEL, DIKO

[Text] According to information from sources close to the AKEL-Democratic Party [DIKO] partnership, disagreements have already started within their ranks, while at the same time serious disagreements have arisen among DIKO leaders.

The disagreements within the ranks of the partnership mainly concern the line that should be followed in the intercommunal talks as well as the issue of the so-called rapprochement.

Specifically, the AKEL leadership maintains that the talks must be continued at all costs even though there are no specific results.

For its part, the DIKO leadership is moving toward suspending the intercommunal talks in the event that, as President Kiprianou has stated, they do not bear fruit within "a reasonable time."

The AKEL leadership, however, opposes the idea of suspending the talks, which seems to be favored by Greek Prime Minister Papandreou. The AKEL leadership maintains that suspending the talks would create tension in Cyprus and would possibly lead the Turkish side to declare a state there.

Disagreements have also emerged over the issue of the stance toward the Turkish Cypriots and the "rapprochement" which the AKEL leadership has been vigorously promoting lately.

According to our information, the DIKO leadership disagrees on the emphasis that the AKEL leadership is giving to the rapprochement, to which the Turkish side seems to be adopting harder positions. Furthermore, the disagreements on this issue have intensified because of the way the government dealt with the issue of the Turkish Cypriot defectors.

Disagreements have also emerged within DIKO because of the watchdog committee, or the directorate, in which no leading DIKO party cadre has been included.

TURKISH VIOLATION OF AIRSPACE PROTESTED 23 NOV

NC232032 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] The Greek Government has protested the violation of Greek airspace by Turkish aircraft in the strongest manner while simultaneously canceling the meeting of the two countries' foreign ministers scheduled for 9 December.

Government spokesman Dhimitris Maroudhas stated this evening: During today's Turkish air-naval exercise in the Aegean, which was planned a long time ago, a series of violations of our national airspace took place. Deputy Foreign Minister Kapsis then summoned Turkish Ambassador Alacam, who was handed a statement in which the Turkish violations are referred to in detail. The statement further adds: These violations constitute a serious provocation, which the Greek Government protests in the strongest manner. Simultaneously, it wants to make it clear to the Turkish Government that the meeting of the foreign ministers of both countries scheduled for 9 December to determine a framework for a Greek-Turkish dialogue cannot be held and be fruitful under such conditions. The government spokesman further said: The Greek Government believes that for the dialogue to be held, a long period of absolute abstention from any provocation is needed, for which the government is prepared to work, believing in the peaceful coexistence of both peoples. The government wants to hope that Turkey will contribute in restoring such conditions. Finally Mr Maroudhas stated: It must be pointed out that in view of the Turkish exercises, Deputy Foreign Minister Kapsis had summoned Turkish Ambassador Alacam on Sunday morning and drew his attention to the consequences of possible violations of Greek airspace.

MINISTRIES MEET ON ADMINISTRATION STREAMLINING

[Text] Yesterday, Minister to the Prime Minister Agamemnon Koutsoyiorgas attributed "negligence" to the secretaries general of the ministries because they delayed sending him their observations on the operation of public service during the PASOK administration. Yesterday's meeting of the secretaries general of all ministries under Koutsoyiorgas lasted 3 hours -- from 6 to 9 pm -- and, as announced, during it:

-- The minister to the prime minister "expounded the problems facing the government in public administration and the gaps that have been ascertained and gave the necessary instructions for their settlement;"

-- Special significance was paid to the elimination of bureaucracy and the acceleration of the preparation of the ministries' organizations.

According to reports, several of the secretaries general who addressed the meeting asked among other things that:

-- Advisers to ministers stop meddling in public administration.

-- The responsibilities of the secretaries general be codified so that issues can be dealt with by all ministries uniformly.

-- The special advisers envisioned by the presidential decree prepared by the ministry to the Prime Minister be "advisers to the ministry" and not just to the minister.

Yesterday, the government spokesman denied all reports published by rightist opposition newspapers that there would be changes in the government and public organizations.

PALESTINIANS ARRESTED FOR SMUGGLING EXPLOSIVES

NC241109 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 23 Nov 82

[Text] Two Palestinians were arrested over the weekend at a northern border crossing with Turkey for attempting to smuggle explosives into Greece, police in Komotini said yesterday.

A police spokesman said customs officials at the Yefira crossing found 60 kilograms (132 pounds) of explosives together with timing devices, detonators and fuses, hidden beneath their car.

The two Palestinians, who crossed the border from Turkey as tourists, told police the explosives were not intended for use in Greece, the spokesman said.

Police said the two men were jailed pending trial on smuggling charges, but gave no more details on the case.

POLICE DETAIN ISLAMIC LIBERATION PARTY MEMBERS

[Oktay Ozeskici report]

[Text] Ankara, (HURRIYET) -- A "Hawks' operation" uncovered the Turkish wing of the secret Islamic Liberation Party (Hizbat Tahrir) which has been in operation for the past 32 years with the objective of uniting Muslim countries under the leadership of a caliph (old title for leaders who were descendants and successors of Mohammad] as a single state which would practise the divine laws of Islam. It has been established that members of the organization have printed and distributed a constitution they call "A Constitution Taken From the Book of Allah and From the Rules of the Prophet." Five thousand copies of this constitution, which consists of 187 articles, have been seized in a house in Ankara. The Turkish founders of the secret Islamic Liberation Party, which is composed of 17 Jordanians and Palestinians and 5 Turks, have been detained.

According to information provided by the authorities, it has been proved that members of the Islamic Liberation Party, who have come to Turkey to obtain higher education and who are students at the Middle East Technical University, have increased their activities in recent years.

Carrying matters a bit too far, members of the organization printed a book called "Constitution Taken From the Book of Allah and From the Rules of the Prophet," presented it to the Islamic Turkish people, and decided to distribute it to fellow-countrymen in Anatolia. The security police, who have been watching the activities of the members of this for some time, carried out an operation called "Hawks" and captured the members of the organization one by one.

Following are the names of the persons who are reported to be the representatives in Turkey of the Islamic Liberation Party and who have been detained:

Hanafi Yaghmur, Mizrab Yaghmur, Sadiq Kullu, Ibrahim Hilal, Khulayd Abu Sqif, 'Asim Hirsh, Bassam 'Uwaski, 'Atif 'Umar, Mazin Abu al-Khayr, 'Arif Yusuf, Yasir Hirsh, 'Ali as-Saylawi, Nadir Faris, 'Abd al-Karim Hirsh, Nadir Taha, Bashir Hirsh, Riyad Malluh, Husayn an-Nabulsi Burhan Ghul, Mukhlis Wazin, Kamal Malak and Nazmi Hamshari.

According to police records, the objective of the Islamic Liberation Party named as Hizb at-Tahrir, is defined as follows:

The Islamic Liberation Party was secretly founded in Jordan in 1950 by a person called Taqiy ad-Din an-Nabani. The party has books entitled Islamic order which define the main thoughts of the party. According to this party, the union of all the Islamic countries as one state under the leadership of a caliph and the implementation of the divine laws by the administration is adopted as the main principle. It is understood from the statements made by some party members, who have been caught and sentenced, that this organization, which operates secretly and illegally in the Arab countries, has sent some of its elements to Turkey. This party is pursuing its activities in Turkey largely through Arab students who are in Turkey for higher education and who are trying to gather sympathizers in our country."

ARMENIAN DAILY AZTAG ADVOCATES ARMED STRUGGLE

GF221947 Beirut AZTAG in Armenian 4 Nov 82 p 4

[Article by Priest Varant Amiralian: "Let Us Rescue All of Armenia With This Weapon"]

[Excerpts] Every time a Turkish diplomat is assassinated or a Turkish target is hit by the freedom-loving Armenian youths, even the most indifferent Armenian is pleased. The victimkilled by the bullets of an Armenian has no meaning as an individual for the Armenians. He is the official representative of the Turkish Government and consequently, through him, the government that sponsors him is the one being attacked. Fortunately, there are insignificant numbers of compatriots who find the killings meaningless, disastrous and anti-Christian. Our words are not for such people, whose mere presence is disastrous for human progress. We are talking about healthy and knowledgeable Armenians, who even with their smiles are encouraging the Armenian liberation struggle.

Each Armenian in diaspora knows very well that "this work" needs men and money. It is not enough to contribute a few liras to the Armenian committees each April. It is not enough to unwillingly send the child to the club, stick up posters or participate in marches. It is not enough to be moved by the brave announcements of Killinjians and Sasunians and drink a toast to them. Even the allocation of a whole week's salary to their funds is not enough. All those are a cheap and easy beginning of real work.

What is the expected? Let us answer this constantly asked question by another one: Who will 'rescue all of Armenia'?

Is it thought that there are "certain people" who, as government employees, are being paid to work for our cause? Or is it that the Sasunians and Killinjians have nothing else to do in their lives? Are education, work, shopping, rest and leisure our only graces? Who gave us that right?

As we do not see individuals in the assassinated Turkish diplomats and regard them as the Turkish Government and Turkism itself, then we are obliged not to differentiate among individuals, whether they be Sasunians, Killinjians, Yergatians or our children. What importance do the Armenian youths, who are struggling, striking, being imprisoned or sentenced to death, and through whom all Armenians are talking and action, represent? The Armenians are not our neighbors or the political organizations. They are us. Me, you and our children. Everything depends on us. It is mean to expect others to sacrifice, to give and to act.

Our allocated money, the satisfaction, joy and beautiful dreams we experience are useless if we do not have the courage to "rescue all of Armenia." Being a true Armenian means to beg the existing political and revolutionary organizations to employ us or our children. We must willingly wait our turn to be registered in the military service for the total liberation of our fatherland as we wait our turn for the obligatory military service in the hospitable countries that we live in.

Unfortunately, the arms grant us life at this period, because when we do not have them, nobody is interested in us, not even our blood-thirsty enemy.

Instead of presenting European or American cars to our children, the time has come to present them with arms. If we are still not void of the Armenian spirit, if we still feel a little bit Armenian, then let us hear the call of the holy fathers, the voice of our suffering fatherland, the clanking of the arms of our heroes and wake up, work, sacrifice and rescue the coming generations today.

Decries Policies on Refugees

GF231138 Beirut AZTAG in Armenian 9 Nov 82 p 4

[Editorial: The Armenian Cause and Afghanistan]

[Text] For 3 months, the Turkish media and a number of international news agencies have said that Turkey -- on the pretext of showing solidarity and sympathy with the opposition elements in Afghanistan against the invasion of the Soviet forces -- is transporting thousands of Afghan refugees, mainly Kirghizes, from Pakistan and is giving them permanent residency rights in the eastern provinces, particularly in the mountainous regions of Erzurum, Kars and Ararat (Agri) Provinces.

This operation to provide for refugees of the Turkish race has been initiated by the Turkish Government leaders -- Turkish Deputy Prime Minister Ozal has visited Pakistan for this purpose -- and it has become formalized.

This is further proof affirming the well-known truth that the Turkishization of the historical Armenian homeland is being carried out with the same official governmental policy as the Turkish genocide and deportation perpetrated by the state planning and organization of the Ottoman and Kemalist Turkey against the Armenians. This is continuation of genocide. Though in a different manner, it is just as radical.

If this is not continued genocide, then what is this official policy for hundreds of years of converting Armenia to a Turkish state, when the Turkish Government knows very well that the remaining Armenians -- a total of approximately 4 million in Soviet Union or diaspora -- the genuine heirs to their historical fatherland, are spread all over the world and sooner or later are sentenced to lose their national identity for the simple reason that the same Turkish Government, through oppressive and terrorist means, is denying the dispersed Armenian masses the right to return to their homeland and national self-determination.

Moreover, the current Turkish political and military leaders are further endeavoring to crystallize their racist dreams and preparing new bloody genocidal plans -- on the account of its neighboring nations -- to remove the Kurdish "millstone" along with the Armenian one.

The genocide is continuing in order to satisfy the criminal appetites of Turkish racism. Generally, Turkey has been implementing this genocidal and racist policy for dozens of years before the whole world on the pretext of serving the interests of the West and waging a struggle against the Soviet Union.

For dozens of years no one in the West or the East has unveiled this Turkish pretense. No one tries to call the genocide by its name and uproot this evil, which is basically directed toward the whole human race.

The member countries of the Atlantic pact, the allies of Turkey and the "foremost" champions of human and national rights are silent. More silent are the Warsaw Pact member countries, the unique constructors of the "socialist" world and the devoted defenders of the small and deprived nations.

Completely silent as well is the Soviet Union, that federated country which, through its diplomats and representatives, also represents the Armenian SSR in international assemblies. Thus, it has at least the moral responsibility to defend the national and human rights of the Armenian people and the Armenian cause and their just struggle against genocide.

Moreover, not only is the Soviet Union silent -- with its great geographic calculations toward genocide and the Armenian cause -- but also the Armenian SSR, as if the Armenian cause does not exist for it.

For dozens of years we constantly waited and demanded an end to the silence, but without results. Thus, the Armenians in diaspora have been left alone in their struggle for the Armenian cause and against genocide.

After waiting for dozens of years, today, particularly during the current struggle of the Armenians in diaspora, it was expected that the silence would truly and completely end, at least in the Armenian SSR.

However, as much as it was a pleasant surprise, the end of this silence in August 1982 by an article sent to the Armenian media on behalf of the cultural relations committee [Armenian SSR Society for Cultural Relations With Compatriots Abroad] and signed by T. Saakyan, was conditional, and more specifically, it was unofficial.

It was conditional because the article was written in regard to settling Afghan refugees in the eastern provinces of Turkey.

The article defended the Armenian cause against the genocide perpetrator as "the historical right of the Armenians in diaspora" to return to their fatherland and achieve free national self-determination.

It was unofficial because the publication of the article has been confined to the Armenian media in diaspora and has not achieved recognition by the paternal media or authorities.

Under these conditions, regardless of the usefulness of the article's contents, the article loses much of its importance and influence for these reasons:

A) The revival or the defense of the Armenian cause by the issue of settling Afghan refugees in Turkey means using it as a means of pressuring Turkey due to its anti-Soviet struggle -- alongside the West -- on the Afghanistan issue. In this case, this means that the revival of the Armenian cause is a means and not an aim.

Thus, the Armenian cause spontaneously becomes a part of a Soviet issue. This is not only counterproductive; it harms the Armenian cause at the international level. It is a move that must be avoided, particularly in regard to current world events.

B) Representing the Armenian cause as only the "historical rights" of the Armenians in diaspora to return to their fatherland and have national self-determination rights means limiting the national concept of the Armenian cause, converting it to different political and national units and violating the general unity and nonseparation of the Armenian cause, the Armenian people and the fatherland.

C) Along with the Armenians in diaspora, the participation of the Armenians of Armenia -- why not, also the Soviet diaspora [viewing Armenians in the Soviet Union as being in diaspora] -- or Yerevan's direct official participation, which would have significance in developing the Armenian cause as much as their absence greatly weaken our liberation struggle on internal and external fronts.

The end of silence regarding the genocide perpetrator and to the advantage of the Armenian cause must be real, complete and constantly unreserved. All other ways are simply half measures, evasion and exploitation.

The Armenian cause is first of all a national cause and must maintain its characteristic under all conditions, particularly toward Afghanistan and generally toward the issues of the West.

Turkish Threats Cited

GF232010 Beirut AZTAG in Armenian 4 Nov 82 p 4

[Excerpts] After the incident at (Eseboga) Airport, it seems that the assassination of the two Turkish diplomats has shaken the Turkish authorities and impelled them to resort to irresponsible threats.

The first of the assassinations we mentioned occurred on 27 August in Ottawa, Canada, when the military attache of the Turkish Embassy, (Atilla Altekat), was killed. The second occurred on 9 September in Burgas, Bulgaria, when the administration attache of the Turkish Embassy, (Bora Sivelkan), was murdered.

On 29 August, Evren visited Afiun district and delivered an official speech on Turkey's most important celebration, National Day. Referring to Armenian terrorism in his speech, he announced: "The Turkish people also have limited patience, and when that patience runs out, no power can stop them." Then he reiterated his warning as follows: "Up to now, Turkey has many times warned that the attacks on Turkish representatives must stop and the criminals must be punished. However, from now on the Turkish Government and people will feel free to take the necessary measures in this regard."

On 29 August, on that same National Day, this time in Ankara during the official celebrations before Ataturk's monument, the Turkish president delivered a speech and referred to terrorism in a general way. However, he felt it necessary to covertly refer to the Armenian territorial demands after noting that Turkey would not concede to terrorism and oppression, whomever the conspirator might be.

Evren added: "As I have always stressed, when we were strong we had too many friends around us, but when we were weak, even those we thought were our friends denied their friendship. Changing the historic facts and fabricating (you realize that he is talking about the genocide) will be of no use. I want to reaffirm that the establishment of a foreign state on even one inch of these territories is impossible."

The above statements show that Turkey's tyrant is confused. The Turkish newspapers are also attributing to official sources the news published after Evren's warnings that "striking groups" will be sent overseas to kill or kidnap the leaders of the Armenian terrorism.

We do not want to reiterate the advice we formerly gave regarding Turkish warnings to show the kind of difficulties Turkey will face if it carries out those warnings or the political and propaganda losses it will incur. We also noted at that time that any government that desires to maintain its sovereignty -- as a friend of Turkey who cooperates with it -- cannot allow Turkish "striking" bands to pursue, kidnap and kill Armenian citizens of the country on its territories. Our foresight has been verified in the case of Canada. According to Turkish sources, Canada has responded in an "extraordinary" way to the news of the Turkish "special striking groups" and has announced that Canadian authorities will never allow the operation of such groups and will prevent any such violations of Canadian laws.

FANFANI TO PRESENT ECONOMIC PLATFORM 24 NOV

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 23 -- Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani will present a detailed economic platform to the five parties of the outgoing government tomorrow in a bid to form Italy's 43rd post-war government. The platform will be discussed Thursday at a meeting Fanfani will have with the secretaries of the five parties which formed the government headed by Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini: the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Republicans, Social Democrats and Liberals, which resigned because of a split between its ministers. It will only be after that meeting that Fanfani will be in a position to announce to President Pertini whether he is ready to form a new government.

The five parties apparently gave Fanfani a green light Monday on foreign policy issues. Social Democrat Party Secretary Pietro Longo told newsmen at the end of a meeting the premier-designate had with the five parties that they all agreed "on foreign policy and respect of the decisions" taken on modernizing Italy's missile systems, a reference to the December 1979 NATO decision to install Pershing and cruise theater nuclear warheads in Europe.

Fanfani, 76, headed his last government 20 years ago.

SPOKESMAN: REAGAN MX MISSILE PROPOSALS WELCOMED

LD231722 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Text] Reagan's remarks [on deployment of U.S. MX missiles] have been received with satisfaction by the U.S. allies in NATO. A NATO spokesman pointed out in this connection that the permanent representatives of the 16 member countries of the Atlantic alliance were informed in advance of the contents of President Reagan's speech. It was added, moreover, that these proposals, coming as they do about a year before the date of the deployment of the new medium-range nuclear missiles -- NATO's Euro-missiles -- represent an important contribution to the search for a compromise through negotiations if the talks fail.

TINDEMANS REPORTS TO SENATE ON FOREIGN POLICY

LD242258 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] The Senate continued its debate on the 1982 [as heard] budget this afternnon, in particular foreign affairs credit allocations which were on the agenda. Minister of External Affairs Mr Tindemans, gave a general report. He mainly dealt with four topics: relations with Latin America, the Middle East, East-West relations and, finally, this own department's budget problems.

On the subject of Latin Ameirca, Leo Tindemans recalled that he has just paid an official visit to Venezuela and Brazil with a view to resuming dialogue and reestablishing mutual trust between Europe and that region of the world following the Falklands Islands events. At the bilateral level, the minister added, the trip should create the possibility of developing cooperation and exchanges in the scientific, technological and industrial spheres with these two important Latin American countries.

Moving on to the Middle East issue, the head of Belgian foreign relations stressed the importance attached to the circulation of the Reagan peace plan and the resolution adopted by the Arab countries following the Fes summit. The Reagan plan, which we support, would mark a new point of departure which should give Israel the right to live in peace within safe borders, Leo Tindemans declared. According to the deputy prime minister, the resolution adopted at the Arab summit in Fes has furthermore and for the first time since Israel's independence permitted the Arab side to present a comprehensive peace plan. The American and Arab initiatives have aroused much hope. The time has come to encourage the Israelis and Palestinians to grant mutual recognition to each other and to recognize each other's rights, Mr Tindemans continued.

The minister of external affairs also said that the Belgian Government is currently examining the clarifications issued by the Lebanese Government concerning the mandate to be extended to the Belgian troops who may possibly be required to reinforce the multinational peace-keeping force in Lebanon.

POLISH COURT CHANGES SENTENCE OF JOURNALIST

NC241959 Paris AFP in English 1950 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] Brussels, Nov 24 (AFP) -- Belgian radio newsman Roger Noel has had his three-year sentence from a Warsaw military court in Poland changed into a 90,000 zlotys (about 10,000 dollars) fine, Belgian Foreign Minstry sources said here today.

The fine will be reduced by 500 zlotys for each day Mr Noel spends in jail, according to the Belgian Embassy in Poland. But Mr Noel will have to pay court costs.

Mr Noel, 27, was arrested on July 5 in the Polish capital when he allegedly tried to hand over a radio transmitter to members of the now-banned independent trade union Solidarity.

The ministry said Mr Noel had been found guilty of the two charges of illegal possession of a transmitter and supplying the material to Solidarity. A third charge of distributing leaflets was dismissed, the sources said.

REACTION TO MX DEPLOYMENT DECISION CONTINUES

DW241329 Bonn DIE WELT in German 24 Nov 82 p 2

[Thomas Kielinger article]

[Text] On Monday evening, President Reagan gave the only proper signal to the new leadership in Moscow -- a signal of continuity, reliability and predictability. Against speculation about the opportunities which allegedly result from Yuriy Andropov's appearance on the international scene and which must therefore be used, Reagan has established the recognizable structure of his disarmament and security policy.

This policy has three characteristics: Military strength, the resulting greater credibility in the disarmament dialogue and the readiness to build greater confidence between the superpowers with the aim of averting accidental nuclear conflicts.

Actually, nothing could undermine the real prospects for a reduction of international tension more than the futile expectation that merely a change of Soviet leadership is reason for the United States to alter its own foreign policy.

The balance of forces in the world is different. For the first time in a long while, U.S. policy under Reagan has an element of long-range thought which is reflected in programs which are to extend beyond even the possible second term of the incumbent President. This is not a signal solely to the Soviet leadership. It is also a signal to the U.S. Congress. If a missile system such as the MX, supported by four administrations, were not approved by a majority of Congress, there would indeed be concerns about American credibility in disarmament negotiations. The Soviets do not take weapons seriously which only exist on paper.

However, in Moscow's view, credibility is not only a question of the strength of leadership toward the Congress, but also a question of whether the President is backed by U.S. public opinion and can implement his program of military strength. Reagan indicated how hard-pressed the White House feels by the aroused debate on nuclear fears when he pointed in his speech to the large number of letters he receives from schoolchildren every day -- letters in the form of "class excercises" from all over the country which "often express fear of the nightmarish aspect of a nuclear holocaust."

Although the president may wish "this wasn't the case," this is part of politics in democracies today. In addition, this is strongly promoted in the United States by the influential Catholic Church. Reagan must respond to this climate with special emphasis on the peace aspects of his policy. However, whether he needed to go so far as to call the new intercontinental missiles "peace-keepers" is a matter of taste.

Nonetheless, Andropov's behavior apparently gives Reagan encouragement. He talked about a "serious" proposal by the Soviets in Geneva and about "a step in the right direction." The chief editor of PRAVDA last week signalled to the Chinese the possibility of a reduction of Soviet forces along the Chinese border. Is Korniyenko's offer to reduce intercontinental systems by one-quarter a counterpart for the West? A lot of things have yet to be determined.

One thing is certain: As long as Moscow and Beijing are so visibly approaching each other, Washington cannot create the impression that it is racing somebody to Moscow. It is not at all clear what price the Chinese will or can ask the Soviets to pay for rapproachement. Nobody in Washington seriously expects the Soviets to give up Afghanistan.

In the Afghan province of Kandahar, 300-400 miles from the Gulf, two Soviet airbases are nearing completion. This is a strategic gain of the kind the Kremlin seldom relinquishes.

Ronald Reagan has no alternative but to stay the course, as he would say. He must present peace to his people as a credible aim of his policy; he must make this policy acceptable to a majority of congress; and in addition, he must make demands on the Soviets, and in perseveringly doing so, also give a signal to China so that in dealing with Moscow, Beijing does not lose confidence in the strategic reliability of the United States.

CHANCELLOR KOHL FOREIGN POLICY STATEMENT

DW251047 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0806 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Government statement presented by Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl to the Bundestag in Bonn -- live]

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: It was from this rostrum on 13 October that I explained to you the goals and priorities which the Federal Government proposed to pursue in its foreign and security policies. Today I will report to you on the meetings and consultations with our most important friends and allies in Europe and North America. I also intend to inform you about the initial talks with members of the Soviet leadership and with government representatives of the GDR.

Ladies and gentlemen, this is naturally not a balance sheet, nor can it be. These meetings clearly demonstrated to me, however, that our friends and allies -- President Reagan, President Mitterrand, Prime Minister Thatcher -- count on the straightforwardness, firmness and reliability of FRG policy. [applause]

They can -- and they know this -- rely on us, just as we can rely on them. I am sure that General Secretary Andropov and General Secretary Honecker also proceed from the premise that FRG policy toward them will remain predictable and therefore solid.

Ladies and gentlemen, our policy remains one of peace, stability, cooperation and partnership in Europe and throughout the world. It remains a policy for the alliance of free and independent democracies; it remains a policy for Europe's unification. For this reason, it was important to me to seek with our most important partners personal contact as swiftly as possible. Trust in a country's policy also presupposes trust in the people and political forces who support and endorse this policy. This wields very significant weight at a time when the change of leadership in the Soviet Union -- even as it took place under the sign of continuity -- also confronts us with questions, expectations and opportunities.

Ladies and gentlemen, the meetings about which I am reporting are important key elements of our foreign and security policies in the Atlantic alliance, in the European Community, in East-West relations, in our relationship with the United States of America and in our relations with the United Nations. The short amount of time since my inauguration did not allow the inclusion of other important fields at this time. This particularly applies to our relations with the Third World countries.

However, ladies and gentlemen, this does not mean that we would like to turn away from the political and economic tasks and responsibilities we have jointly undertaken with our European Community partners in the Middle East, in Africa, Asia and Latin America. I want to expressly underscore this, just as I did a few days ago here in Bonn to the representatives of the diplomatic corps.

To the extent that our forces and means allow, we, the FRG, will remain a good friend and helpful partner to our friends and partners in these regions. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to begin my report with the German-French consultations. My visit to Paris and the 40th German-French summit meeting confirmed the normalcy of German-French relations -- normalcy regardless of the governments and the political forces supporting them in France and the FRG at any one time. This normalcy also means that it was a foregone conclusion for me to make my first visit to Paris directly after my election. I did this because we are aware -- and at this point I would like to quote President Mitterrand -- to what degree the relations between our two countries constitute an essential element of peace, of balance and of the well-being in both our countries -- the well-being of all Europe and, no doubt, the entire world.

German-French cooperation as drawn up nearly 20 years ago by Konrad Adenauer and Charles de Gaulle in the Elysee treaty has done more than just prove its worth. That would be putting it much too mildly because new fields constantly have been added to it. It is a friendship that has grown not only between governments but, above all, between the two peoples in the middle of Europe. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, we -- and I am sure I am speaking on behalf of the entire Bundestag -- do not interpret this cooperation as excluding any other. Rather, we want to make it beneficial for the cohesion and the cooperation within the European Community. Thus, it also serves the solidity of the Atlantic alliance with which both our countries are affiliated.

For this very reason, during previous German-French consultations, we have jointly reaffirmed essential positions of the alliance's policy, such as both parts of the dual decision. Out of common concern over matters of security, we also agreed on an intensive exchange of opinions on matters of security at regular intervals.

In the future, joint talks between the two countries' foreign and defense ministers will be a firm part of German-French cooperation. For the first time in 19 years, we have thus put into practice an agreement contained in the Elysee treaty. It is important for us to have an exchange of opinions with an important and great neighbor. This also is useful for the West's common security.

Ladies and gentlemen, on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the German-French friendship treaty, we will celebrate the significance of our relations in Bonn on 20 January and in Paris on 21 January -- in Bonn also in the Bundestag -- in a dignified setting. We understand very well the concerns of our French friends over some developments in their balance of trade. We told them that among friends we must talk with each other and, above all, try to find workable solutions in difficult times. We are aware that setting up barriers to our markets will harm us and that thereby more jobs will be jeopardized on a long-term basis than ensured on a short-term basis. [applause] I hope that in a number of talks we are to hold, we will make progress in coming to terms with this problem.

On 7 December I will again meet President Mitterrand for a brief exchange of views.

Ladies and gentlemen, my visit to London and the progress of the 12th German-British summit on 28-29 October have confirmed the continuity and closeness of German-British relations as well as the agreement between our two governments on important European and international affairs. Above all, it was our joint conviction that it is of vital importance for Europe to intensify its partnership with our friends in the United States. The Federal Government has roted with satisfaction the British pledge that the Rhine Army and the British Air Force will remain in Germay without reduction. The presence of British troops along the Rhine and in Berlin strengthens the alliance and our political relations. [applause]

The visit Prime Minister Thatcher paid to Berlin following the Bonn summit was a convincing expression of the commitment by which Great Britain, together with France and the United States, guarantees the freedom and security of our former capital. The Federal Government is very grateful to Mrs Thatcher for this gesture of friendship and solidarity with all Germans on both sides of the Iron Curtain. [applause]

Like my visits to other European capitals, my visit to Rome served to establish initial contacts with an important partner in the European Community as well as in the Atlantic alliance. My talks with President Pertini, acting Prime Minister Spadolini, many old friends from the Christian Democrats and politicians from other parties such as Craxi, secretary of the Socialist Party, again have shown me the great harmony of thought and action regarding questions of European unity as well as regarding vital problems of the life of the alliance.

This above all applies to the German-Italian initiative for a European act from which we expect new movement to come toward European unity. Within the scope of our possibilities, we will therefore energetically seek to promote this German-Italian initiative after 1 January 1983 when the European Community has a German president.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me say in this connection how greatly I was impressed during my talk with Pope John Paul II -- how greatly I was impressed by his passionate efforts for religious freedom and human rights, as well as for a dialogue with those who have different beliefs. Pope John Paul II warmly expressed appreciation for the great degree of helpfulness that many of our compatriots in Germany have shown his compatriots in Poland.

I also want to mention with satisfaction the friendly talks I had with the Luxembourg prime minister. For several reasons I considered this meeting to be of special importance because for many years I have been in particular agreement with Prime Minister Werner regarding his very realistic commitment to European unity; because as minister-president of the Rhineland Palatinate, I personally saw Luxembourg develop into one of the bastions of European thought; and not lastly -- and I want to stress this particularly ladies and gentlemen -- because I believe that European cooperation can be successful and European unity will only be possible if the larger members of the European Community show special respect for the smaller members in cooperation between the individual European countries. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, as I said on 13 October, the foundation of German foreign and security policy is the North Atlantic Alliance as well as the friendship and partnership with the United States. My talks in Washington -- above all with President Reagan, Secretary of State Shultz shortly after his return from Moscow, Secretary of Defense Weinberger, Secretary of the Treasury Regan and numerous other personalities from political and economic life and from the trade unions -- have consolidated this foundation. I am quite sure about this.

I was and remain impressed by the extremely kind, friendly and even warm welcome the President, Mrs Reagan and the members of the American administration gave me, my wife and the members of our delegation. I am grateful for this welcome. [applause] I state this all the more readily because, although it is true that this welcome was for me personally and my entourage, it was also equally for the German partner in the alliance who is being given special attention by the United States in view of the current international political situation and -- I want to say this too -- who is being listened to at this very time.

The President is also of the conviction, which I share, that among good friends you must talk with, and not about one another. This especially also applies when there are diverging interests on individual problems. Some of the European-American differences, which were often too much in the center of public attention in recent weeks and months, were removed prior to my arrival in Washington. On the basis of the steel arrangement negotiated by the Commission with the United States, the differences which had existed for some time regarding the level of European steel deliveries to the United States were settled.

Ladies and gentlemen, the German steel industry understandably did not find it easy to approve of this arrangement. We have made sacrifices here, and I also made this quite clear in Washington. However, in the final analysis, a compromise was found in this matter which is useful for everyone and everything -- our European partners, the coherence of the Community, transatlantic relations and ultimately, also our steel industry which was given a firm share of the market.

What I have said here also applies to the lifting of the U.S. sanctions which hit hard those European firms participating in the natural gas-pipeline deal. Everyone in this house knows -- and I will not deny it -- that I was not a proponent of this deal. However, ladies and gentlemen, I clearly stress that we Germans are reliable contract partners and that the agreements concluded are valid. [applause]

German policy must be one which honors agreements; then it will be a predictable policy which develops into a policy of peace. Therefore, I welcomed the lifting of the sanctions. The Federal Government also considers this to be a signal to the Soviet Union for the development of more constructive East-West relations. The seven countries at the summit, with the participation of the European Community, have been able to work out substantial agreement on the most important elements of an overall concept of East-West economic relations. The talks will be continued, and I am certain today that we are on the right track and will come to a reasonable, definite and mutual decision.

This agreement with our American partner, in which the Federal Government actively and, I hope, constructively cooperated, certainly made my talks in Washington easier. The same thing applies to the successful talks my colleague Woerner had with Secretary of Defense Weinberger shortly before my talks. The American President and I held our talks in the clear awareness of our common German-American interests and the common ideas we share concerning democracy, freedom and the state ruled by law.

With full conviction I told all my interlocutors that my compatriots in the FRG support German-American relations and our partnership in the alliance. Our American friends may rest assured that we remain reliable allies. [applause] In this sense the American President expressly stated his high appreciation of the significant and continuous German contribution to our common defense. We are also aware that we can rely on the United States.

We highly appreciate it -- and I also said this clearly -- when an American President says in Berlin and again during the welcome he gave me on the White House grounds: You are not alone; we are with you.

For more than three decades the United States has made a decisive contribution to ensuring peace in Europe. The American Government and we are convinced that the undiminished presence of American troops in Europe and the guarantee by the United States of our common security remain indispensable. Since the founding of the Federal Republic, eight American presidents and six German federal chancellors have contributed to this German-American partnership, irrespective of any domestic policy changes and changes of government in our countries. I consider it to be one of my most important tasks to strengthen this partnership during my term in office. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, in this connection we must emphasize our interests to our partner, but we must also support the United States according to our strength and ability in its safeguarding of the common interests of the free industrial states.

The death of party and state leader Brezhnev, and the appointment of his successor, General Secretary Andropov, gave special significance to the exchange of views on East-West relations with the President and the secretary of state. There was full mutual agreement that the policy of the alliance, which is based on firmness and receptiveness to negotiations, is very important, especially in this situation. The United States, as well as we are, is prepared in the future to expand cooperation with the Soviet Union and the East European states to mutual advantage.

Ladies and gentlemen, further developments in Poland will play a role in this, as will the future Soviet course of action in Afghanistan and its actions at the current disarmament negotiations. In view of the situation in Afghanistan, I would like to add today that the Federal Government continues to expressly advocate an early withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. [applause]

The U.S. President and I were in agreement on the significance of both parts of the NATO dual decision for a military balance of power. In my talks in Washington and in my public remarks in the United States, I made it quite clear that we attach great importance to earnest and serious negotiations in Geneva and that we are following the current negotiations with keen attention and great commitment.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Federal Government is convinced that the U.S. representatives in Geneva are negotiating seriously and with a clear desire to achieve success. Our American partners keep us constantly and comprehensively informed. Just a few days ago, Chief U.S. Delegate Ambassador Nitze, as well as Ambassador Rostow, called on me and on Minister Genscher for this very purpose. We and our alliance partners have the opportunity to exert influence on the negotiations within the framework of intensive consultations, and we are making use of this opportunity.

I was very much impressed by the President's personal commitment to these negotiations. I share this impression with my predecessor, Chancellor Schmidt, who returned home with the same conviction after his talks with President Reagan. Our firm determination to deploy, if deployment should become necessary, is an absolutely necessary precondition for the success of these negotiations. In this event, the number of systems will be deployed as agreed in the dual decision and in accordance with the time schedules for the preparatory work. I wish to stress this quite distinctly because there has been a public discussion on this point in the Federal Republic over the past few weeks.

As far as the Federal Government is concerned -- and in this respect there are clear promises which have again been reaffirmed by the American side -- what has been agreed remains valid. That is, both parts of the dual decision remain valid and the agreed upon number of systems to be deployed if these systems are stationed in the FRG still applies. [applause]

There was full agreement between the President and myself, ladies and gentlemen, on the great significance of the comprehensive offer of disarmament given to the Soviet Union. In his speech this Monday, the President extended this offer with the proposal of additional confidence-building measures. We welcome this initiative because it may contribute to reducing distrust and the danger of a miscalculation in the area of nuclear weapons.

In a conversation with the U.S. President, I suggested that his earlier offer to meet with General Secretary Brezhnev be renewed to General Secretary Andropov in the near future. I believe that this might have a favorable effect on East-West relations and on current negotiations, especially on the Geneva INF talks.

It goes without saying, ladies and gentlemen, that such a meeting would be sensible only if it is most carefully prepared and coordinated with regard to content, range of topics and timing.

Ladies and gentlemen, another important subject of our talks was the critical situation of our countries' economies. I told my interlocutors of our satisfaction over the reduction in interest rates already implemented in the United States. It remains decisive and important to us that this development continue.

Based on the results of the Versailles economic summit, we stated that it is important, especially in the present difficult situation, not to seek any solution for one's own economic difficulties at the expense of the partners. The results of my talks in the United States are summed up in a communique to which I would expressly like to draw your attention -- a communique which, I believe, will also be significant for our future policy.

In summing up, I may say that: I believe that my visit clearly confirmed that it is worthwhile to talk with each other in friendship and in a spirit of cooperation, but also in all frankness. All frankness means, of course, a clear presentation of one's own interests to the partner. I explained to the President what it means for us and our policy that we are a divided country on the dividing line between East and West; that the wall and barbed wire run clear across the middle of Germany; that Berlin is divided; and that this situation makes us Germans especially sensitive to developments in international politics. I particularly discussed with him the situation in Berlin of which he was still fully aware from his recent visit. Above all, I spoke about the great concerns which Berlin's economic situation cause us.

Both sides, the United States and we, stand unreservedly by the overall political strategy of the alliance and its instruments as reaffirmed at the Bonn NATO summit: defense, arms control, dialogue and cooperation with the East under full preservation of Western security interests.

This, ladies and gentlemen, is our common political basis. I and the government I head will continue to strengthen our partnership with the United States on this basis in the future through intensified consultations. I am gratified to note that we will have another opportunity to do this on the occasion of the visit of Secretary of State Schultz with Minister Genscher on 6 and 7 December.

During the past several weeks, ladies and gentlemen, we have succeeded in eliminating differences of opinion which burdened transatlantic relations and even the cohesion in the alliance. We did this by meeting each other halfway. This makes me feel hopeful for the future. [applause] This was possible because the basis of common interests is broad and durable and because compromises among friends can be made on such a basis.

During my visit to the United States, I met in New York with Perez de Cuellar, secretary general of the United Nations. During this meeting we discussed the contributions which the United Nations could make to solving a number of serious political crises in various regions of the world. We also discussed the continuation of the North-South dialogue. I reassured the secretary general that the Federal Government will continue its active and constructive cooperation in the United Nations within the framework of its peace policy. The Federal Government will also continue to support a strengthening of the United Nations and its peace-keeping organizations.

Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to say something about developments in the Soviet Union. It remains the declared policy of the Federal Government to attach great significance to relations with the Soviet Union and also to further develop them under continual consideration of the overall situation in East-West relations. In talks with Solomentsev, candidate member of the Politburo, and Soviet Deputy Chairman Kostandov, I noted with satisfaction that this also fully and completely corresponds with the intentions of the Soviet leadership. This was also confirmed during the important discussions which the federal president and the federal foreign minister had with new CPSU General Secretary Andropov on the occasion of the funeral ceremonies for Leonid Brezhnev, late Soviet head of state and party. From this rostrum I expressly repeat for the benefit of the Soviet Union that as far as we are concerned, relations with the Soviet Union are highly important. They are important because the Soviet Union bears great responsibility for peace in Europe and the world; they are important to us in particular, because the Soviet Union is one of the four powers responsible for Berlin and for Germany as a whole. The federal president and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher also clearly expressed this in their talks with General Secretary Andropov.

For us, cooperation between East and West is to be planned on the basis of long-term treaties and agreements. This means that obstacles can be overcome if we want to overcome them, ladies and gentlemen, and that setbacks -- even serious setbacks such as those resulting from the tragic events in Afghanistan and Poland -- must not be regarded as final if the Soviet Union makes the appropriate contribution. [applause]

The Federal Government has attentively taken note of the remarks by the CPSU general secretary to the Central Committee Plenum. We are prepared to favorably react to steps in the direction of constructive East-West relations. However, ladies and gentlemen, what counts in this respect are actions and facts. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the Federal Government and -- I am sure -- the vast majority of FRG citizens are attentively following events in Poland and with profound inner commitment. Our interest in, and our humane sympathy for, the fate of our Polish neighbors goes without saying. It is our conviction that the Poles themselves must solve their difficult political and social problems through internal understanding and without interference. [applause]

The spontaneous readiness to help as manifested in the innumerable donations by private citizens, church congregations, associations, trade unions and federations is the most evident expression of the reconciliation between our two peoples. Here the policy of understanding has borne good and strong fruit. And now, just before Christmas, all of us should encourage our compatriots to continue this course of active help for our neighbors. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, we -- and here, too, I may say all of us -- hope that martial law will be replaced with a true dialogue between the government, the church and the appropriate representatives of all social groups. We hope that the release of trade union leader Walesa will contribute to paving the way to this goal, and we hope for further steps in this direction. [applause]

I am gratified to note that the meeting in Moscow of the federal president and Federal Minister Genscher with the GDR State Council chairman, General Secretary Honecker, provided an opportunity to reaffirm our interest in the continuation of the dialogue with the GDR on all levels. It became evident that interest in such a dialogue and in such a development exists on the GDR side as well. During the past 10 days, three events demonstrated that talks and contacts were continuing: the opening of our exhibition called city park-park city in Magdeburg by Minister Schneider and his meeting with Junker, GDR minister of construction; the opening of the GDR's Schinkel exhibition in Hamburg by Minister of State Jenninger; and the commissioning of the autobahn between Berlin and Hamburg by Minister of Transport Dollinger and his talks with his GDR counterpart, Arndt. [interjection]

I assume that this makes you very happy indeed, ladies and gentlemen. [applause] I was happy about this because it offered an opportunity to eliminate atagonistic images on both sides of the Iron Curtain. [applause]

In my 13 October government statement, I said that the GDR may rest assured that we will abide by commitments which have been undertaken, and we expect the GDR to likewise abide by the letter and spirit of these treaties. The modus vivendi created by these treaties forms the foundation from which we propose to proceed for the benefit of the people in Germany. This is part of an active peace policy.

We are in agreement with General Secretary Honecker that the two German states bear a special responsibility for peace, especially in view of the present international situation. Even if important questions of principle remain open between ourselves and the GDR, we must nevertheless try to ensure that mutual relations will be further developed in the interests of peace in Europe and, above all, in the interests of the people of Germany. [applause]

The aggravation of intra-German tourist traffic as a result of the increase in the minimum required currency exchange has played an important part in the dialogue with the GDR leadership. The federal president and Federal Minister Genscher pointed out to General Secretary Honecker that especially in this field, an important contribution to improving relations is expected.

Ladies and gentlemen, our fellow citizens in the GDR and the citizens in our country rightly assess the results of German policy by the criterion, the principal criterion, of how much more freedom of movement there is for people, information and opinions. [applause]

In summing up, allow me to say that the talks and meetings about which I have reported, clearly outline the Federal Government's foreign and security policies. Our policy is one which strengthens the alliance. The North Atlantic Alliance and friendship and partnership with the United States constitute the foundation of our security policy. Only a strong and united alliance of free nations can ensure peace in freedom. This alliance also remains the basis for a policy of true relaxation of tensions. [applause]

The Federal Government will continue to pursue the goal of a balance of military forces on as low a level as possible. We propose to attain this objective through agreed arms control and disarmament. The dialogue in East-West relations remains useful and necessary, and contributes to making Europe and Germany's partition more bearable for the people and for eventually overcoming it, something that must always be a goal of German policy.

We will insist on the observance of the Helsinki Final Act. The Federal Government advocates a strengthening of the CSCE process and adheres to the goal of successfully concluding the CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid. By its cohesive and calm conducting of negotiations, the West demonstrates that we are serious about the demand for a substantial and balanced final document. It is necessary to achieve tangible progress in human rights, human contacts and information, just as it is necessary to obtain a precise mandate for a conference on disarmament in Europe. The Warsaw Pact countries are called upon to constructively reply to the Western proposals advanced in Madrid.

Ladies and gentlemen, we are also conducting a direct dialogue with the Soviet Union. For this reason, I welcome the fact that Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko intends to come to Bonn for talks in January at the beginning of the new year. [interjection]

If we share this opinion, I have no objection to your applause, ladies and gentlemen of the SPD. [applause]

Our policy is one for Europe. My colleague, Foreign Minister Genscher, will speak in greater detail on this topic during the subsequent debate. Let me just say that European integration is one of the decisive tasks of our era. I fully and completely agreed with President Mitterand when he said during the latest German-French consultations that unless Europe obtains a stronger political basis for itself, the weight of various interests will soon tear the fabric of Europe to shreds. What he meant, was interests in the national sense of the word. I hope that all of us can agree with this statement by the French president. [applause] I would like to add that there is no alternative to this policy. If we fail to take a decisive step on the road toward the political unification of Europe in this decade and in our generation, we will lose the opportunity and the historical mandate of our generation.

Ladies and gentlemen, in this connection we should not be fainthearted. When we see how from past centuries into the present century, the course of European nations and peoples moved apart, and even against each other, and when we consider in comparison, what has been possible in the past three decades despite all difficulties, this ought to provide encouragement. To me it is greatly encouraging that the president of the first freely elected European Parliament is our guest here today during this debate. [prolonged applause]

In connection with the German presidency of the European Community at the beginning of next year, the Federal Government will try to set clear signals for a forward development of the Community.

I am fully aware of the difficulties awaiting us on this road. Still, I believe that if there is any country in Europe with every reason to attempt steps in this direction in view of the experiences of its history, then it is we Germans.

Ladies and gentlemen, a Community that is capable of working and making decisions is important to us. Above all, it is important to us to strengthen the solidarity of the Community's members in the most important issues: The struggle against unemployment, the political and economic problems of our common security, questions concerning trade, and questions concerning free movement of goods and people within the Community.

It is also of primary importance for us to revive the awareness of the principle that the Community is not merely a distribution mechanism for budget funds or some technocratic apparatus, but that it is a tight union of the liberally and democratically organized states of Western Europe, and a Community which is vital for all of us. [applause]

Together we are thus an influential partner of the United States and can live up to our responsibilities in East-West relations and as regards our friends throughout the world.

Ladies and gentlemen, we cannot and must not be concerned with saddling the Community with our own commitments. Rather, a stronger commitment and the stronger responsibility of all member states for the functioning of the Community and the cooperation within its framework is necessary.

Our policy remains one of partnership with the Third World countries. The Federal Government respects the right of states to independence and self-determination. It supports the right of these peoples to freely choose their political, economic and social systems. On a worldwide scale, the Federal Government advocates respect for the dignity and rights of man without which there can be no peace in the long run -- neither internal nor external. In supporting the independence and sovereignty of the Third World states, we will endeavor even in our currently difficult situation to maintain the level of development aid and, as soon as it becomes possible, to increase it.

Our policy is one of free world trade. We advocate the view that one must solve one's own problems by his own efforts and not at the expense of others, of other countries and people. In this spirit, the Federal Government also expects the GATT ministers conference to strengthen the system of free world trade. [applause]

Mr president, ladies and gentlemen, our policy above all is one for peace in freedom. The preservation of peace is the supreme goal of the policy of the Federal Government. This is how the statement begins with which the Federal Government sums up its deliberations yesterday on security policy questions. Renunciation of force is the core of our security policy because we want to preserve peace. The Atlantic alliance expressed this in the Bonn statement of 10 June 1982 as follows: None of our weapons will ever be used, unless in reply to an attack.

Ladies and gentlemen, thanks to this policy, no war has taken place in Europe for more than 25 years now, and our continent need not be afraid of war even today. What we must fear today is a disturbance of the balance.

It is with concern that we observe the Soviet Union undertaking great efforts and seeking over an entire decade to change the military power ratio to its advantage by developing and improving its weapons.

This applies to almost all types of weapons -- nuclear weapons, conventional weapons and above all, naval armament. We are especially concerned about the buildup of Soviet medium-range missiles. More than 300 missiles with over 900 warheads have already been deployed. They are also targeted at our country.

Because we -- together with our alliance partners -- don't want an arms race, we are pursuing a policy of willingness to negotiate, and a policy of firmess. We are equally convinced that we must try to do everything in our power to achieve and ensure a balance at the lowest possible level. Ladies and gentlemen, I repeat what I said in my government statement: We want more security with fewer weapons and fewer soldiers. [applause]

The persistence with which the Federal Government is trying to achieve concrete and verifiable arms control and disarmament is for us not just required by good sense. In view of the almost unimaginable destructive power of nuclear weapons, it is a moral duty to do everything possible to prevent the arms arsenals from being increased further, and to reduce them. [applause]

The Christian churches have provided clear and unequivocal answers. The pastoral [word indistinct] of the Second Vatican Council, the church in the world today, says -- I quote -- "because peace should spring from the mutual confidence of people, instead of being imposed on the nations through the terror of weapons, everyone should try to put an end to the arms race. Disarmament must really be begun, not unilaterally, but in contractually agreed upon equal steps and with genuine and effective safeguards."

The 1982 memorandum of the Evangelical Church in Germany entitled Perservering, Promoting and Renewing Peace, contains the same demand. I quote: "It must be our goal to shape a political peace order which allows the dismantling of the means of military force." Ladies and gentlemen, none of us can close his mind to these serious and responsible warnings. The Federal Government will be guided by this spirit in its security policy. The most urgent problem of security policy is the medium-range nuclear weapons. Just as our predecessor, the Schmidt government, the Federal Government adheres to both parts of the dual decision because it seriously and definitely desires that the Geneva Negotiations be successful. Because we want the Geneva negotiations to succeed, we are counting on the solidarity of all alliance partners who, like us, have committed themselves to both parts of the dual decision.

Ladies and gentlemen, to clearly reiterate, those who really want the Soviet medium-range SS-20 missiles to be dismantled, and who don't want a corresponding counterarmament in Europe, must support the policy of the dual decision. [applause] I know from my talks with the American Government, especially with the President himself, that he also knows that these negotiations are not just any negotiations, but negotiations regarding our existence.

We have also made it quite clear to the new Soviet leadership that nobody in the FRG wants new American missiles to be stationed here. However, together with our alliance partners, we cannot accept being directly threatened by hundreds of the most modern Soviet medium-range missiles. The only way to prevent Western counterarmament is for both sides to renounce the deployment of these weapons. [applause]

The Federal Government is aware of the consequence of the decisions that have been and are yet to be made. I am convinced that the course my government will jointly purse with the FDP and CDU/CSU factions is correct and meets our political responsibility.

I am earnestly prepared to discuss the correctness of this course with anyone who shares our goal of preserving peace in freedom. Ladies and gentlemen, it goes without saying in a democratic country that different views will be held on such an important issue of principle. We must struggle in a almost fateful way for the right course. The more clearly and frankly this debate is conducted -- including here in the Bundestag -- the better it will be for our country, because what is important is peace and freedom in our fatherland. [applause]

Comments of SPD's Wischnewski

[Excerpts] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, SPD Presidium member, speaking for the Social-Democratic opposition in the 25 November Bundestag debate on foreign policy] accused the Federal Government of not doing enough to achieve positive results at the Geneva negotiations, and as a result, actually encouraging counter-arming. The federal chancellor so far has not said a word about "possibilities for flexibility" which the West is seeking in order to prevent a failure of the two superpowers medium-range missile talks in Geneva. "This is not continuity but a turning away," the SPD Presidium member said.

In the SPD Presidium members' view, these "possibilities for flexibility" at the Geneva talks include the question of whether the talks on medium-range missiles should be included in the START negotiations on intercontinental missiles. In addition, there is the question of whether the French and British nuclear weapons "which play a role in the overall strategic situation" should likewise be taken into consideration. "In the interests of reaching a solution at the negotiations," Wischnewski said, "other systems, such as air-based missiles (aircraft), should not be excluded." Part of foreign policy continuity, repeatedly stressed by the Federal Government, is that Bonn should influence the Geneva talks with the idea that results are achieved, and in our view, this is no longer the case."

The SPD Presidium member made a strong personal attack on Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at the beginning of the debate. [passage indistinct] in the SPD's view, foreign policy changes are emerging which are aimed at "reverting to the old hard-line policy" after the 6 March elections.

Wischnewski urged the Federal Government not to let any break occur in the necessary dialogue with the East, particularly now in the wake of the important changes in Moscow. It is important not only to respect the existing treaties but constantly to fill them with new life. On the situation in Poland, the SPD Presidium member said that the release of Lech Walesa is an "important step in the right direction." The prerequisites for lifting martial law "appear to have become more favorable." In a direct appeal to the federal chancellor, Wischnewski called for comprehensive aid measures to improve the Polish population's supplies of medicines.

Brandt Speaks

[Text] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has warned Chancellor Helmut Kohl against taking it for granted, before the conclusion of the Geneva disarmament negotiations, that the new medium-range missiles will be deployed.

This afternoon, continuing the debate in the Bundestag on the chancellor's government foreign policy statement, Brandt said that Kohl should avoid giving any impression that he is commiting himself in advance. For the SPD, it is neither an automatic process nor carte blanche. Continuity did not mean assuming a negative outcome to the negotiations. It is much more a case of working for a positive process.

Brandt gave the assurance that the Social Democrats would do their utmost to see that the great powers agreed to the dismantling of their missiles at the negotiations. Here the connection between the negotiations on intercontinental missiles and medium-range missiles must not be overlooked. On the one hand, the Soviet Union must be pressed to make some move, while on the other, one wants to ask the United States to do everything possible to make the deployment of new missiles unnecessary.

Brandt said that the SPD would not allow there to be talk of continuity along with possible juggling of terminology. In agreement with SPD chancellor candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel, he stressed that his party firmly adheres to the EEC, NATO, German-American friendship and the special nature of Franco-German cooperation. The SPD supports a steady continuation of reconciliation with the East and also good-neighborliness with the GDR. It also recognizes the Bundeswehr's contribution to joint Western defense.

Genscher Remarks

[Text] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- The NATO dual decision and its possible consequences with regard to counterarming were commented on by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) [in the 25 November Bundestag debate in foreign policy] He rejected all divergent interpretations and called for straight adherence to the agreements. Anyone who does not want to counterarm -- and this is the attitude and hope of all parties here -- must not allow any doubts to emerge as to his determination to counterarm if the worst comes to the worst."

Genscher warned against introducing new elements into the debate about medium-range missile counterarming, as earlier proposed by SPD presidium member Wischnewski. An inclusion of French and British nuclear weapons must be rejected. In this situation, "the last thing we need is a clash with France regarding elementary security issues." Genscher also added the reminder that "in the event of partial or total counterarming, other warheads which were already sited would be correspondingly withdrawn."

In the foreign minister's view, the change in Soviet leadership offers new opportunities for agreements. Genscher strongly advocated a "policy of extending one's hand," which could bring progress. Genscher sees hopes for the Vienna troop reduction talks and for attempts to reach trust-building measures at the Madrid CSCE follow-up meeting. There have been remarks from Moscow which hinted at the Soviets' readiness to hold talks on the conventional balance in central Europe. This could be an important starting point for overall disarmament policy.

LEADERS MEET NATO'S LUNS FOR POLICY TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Defense Minister Manfred Woerner today received NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns in Bonn for talks on the current position of the North Atlantic defense alliance with regard to security policy. It was Luns' first visit to the new Federal Government.

During Kohl's meeting with Luns, which Foreign Minister Genscher also attended, the chancellor stressed the Federal Government's determination to strengthen the alliance and, as it has done to date, to make an important contribution to this end. Kohl underlined the Federal Government is sticking to both parts of the NATO dual decision and stressed its overriding interest in a successful conclusion of the U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva during the coming year.

Cabinet Hears NATO Analyses

LD241620 Hamburg DPA in German 1504 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government has called on the Soviet Union to refrain from seeking military superiority as well as from the threat and use of force. After a several-hour cabinet discussion today, the government said that Moscow continues to tip the military balance in its favor by arming both in the nuclear and conventional fields. The Soviet Union has shown that it is prepared "to use the capabilities it has gained in this manner to implement its foreign policy aims."

The cabinet met in the Defense Ministry to hear for the first time military analyses by all three commander in chiefs of the NATO command zones for Europe, for the Atlantic, the United States as well as for Britain, the Channel and the Eastern Atlantic.

Government Spokesman Diether Stolze refused to answer journalists' questions on details of the reports on the grounds that it is not good practice to reveal the contents of such secret sessions.

Stolze refused to reply to the question about whether the demand of the NATO supreme commander, Bernard Rogers, for a four percent increase in real terms in defense expenditure had been spoken of. No concrete decisions had been made. There had been "considerable agreement" between Chancellor Helmut Kohl and the commanders. In its statement, the government stressed once again that the deployment of new nuclear medium-range weapons at the end of 1983 would take place as envisaged in the NATO dual decision, if there were no concrete results in the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union in Geneva that would make deployment unnecessary by that time.

Stolze said that all aspects of security policy had been touched on. On the question of medium-range weapons, Stolze confirmed that the West is working toward a 'zero solution' in Geneva. The statement goes on to say that NATO is concerned with military balance as the basis of its security. The security needs of the Soviet Union should not be at the expense of the security of the North Atlantic Alliance and Western Europe. The FRG "is still prepared for more constructive relations, dialogue and cooperation with the Soviet leadership."

According to the Federal Government, the alliance is keeping to its well-proven strategy of the flexible reaction. "The prevention of war through credible deterrence assumes that the alliance is prepared to and capable of repelling every attack with the appropriate means." This requires sufficient conventional and nuclear forcs. The strengthening of conventional defense increases the military security of Western Europe. In the recent past, General Rogers has time and again demanded a considerable strengthening ofthe conventional component weapons.

The Federal Government wants to do all it can to maintain the combat readiness of the Federal Army and to "provide the necessary means for this."

Arms control and disarmament are integral elements of the security policy of the Atlantic alliance. The Federal Government and its partners in the alliance "still have the aim of using negotiations on arms control and disarmament in order to establish a stable balance of forces at the lowest possible level." Military service in the alliance is active peace service. Stolze made it clear that because of the years of low birthrates in the FRG, after 1985 it will be necessary to increase the duration of military service. Decisions have not yet been made, however.

Woerner on Security Problems

DW260823 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 24 Nov 82

[From the "Heute" newscast]

[Text] For 10 years now, the Federal Cabinet has met once a year in the Defense Ministry at the Hardthoehe in Bonn. This year the three supreme commanders of the NATO command branches took part in the meeting for the first time. They informed the approximately 50 participants about the situation in NATO. Afterwards, Defense Minister Woerner talked with ZDF [begin recording:]

[Woerner] Skepticism prevails. This means that all three commanders pointed to the fact that the Warsaw Pact has considerably increased its efforts, especially in the conventional weapons field, so that the gap between our efforts and those of the other side is constantly widening. This means that all three commanders are concerned about being able to fulfill their responsibilities.

[Unidentified interviewer] What conclusions can a politician draw from the report?

[Answer] We must intensify our efforts, especially in the conventional sectors, and we must, above all, try to strive for intensive disarmament accords in the conventional field. We cannot just concentrate on the nuclear field.

[Question] Does this also mean more money for the Bundeswehr?

[Answer] It does in the long run, if we don't achieve disarmament agreements. On a short basis, our economic situation is such that the restoration of sound national finances is of primary importance and this allows us to make only limited efforts. [end recording]

LD251134 Hamburg DPA in German 1000 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- Philip Jenninger, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office, is to pay a 1-day visit to East Berlin next Thursday (2 December). A Federal Government spokesman stated in Bonn today that Jenninger will visit the Federal Republic's permanent mission and meet GDR representatives.

It has been learned that he will meet Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer, and Guenter Mittag, Politburo member responsible for economic issues.

GDR COMPLAINS ABOUT FRG CREDIT PRACTICES

DW260745 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 25 Nov 82 p 13

[Text] Hamburg, 24 November -- This year, inter-German trade will reach a new record high. According to estimates by both sides, the mutual trade volume will increase by 12 percent in 1982 to approximately 14 billion accounting units (one accounting unit equals about DM1).

Prof Erich Freund, the first chairman of the GDR/FRG trade association, assessed this increase as being quite presentable when viewed against the background of the generally weak world economic development and, as he expressly emphasized, against the background of the cyclic situation of the FRG market which does not particularly promote inter-German trade.

At the beginning of 2-day economic talks in Hamburg, in which several hundred representatives from the economics of both states participated, Freund particularly criticized the credit practice of the German banks which do not promote trade. In view of the increasing financing difficulties of banks throughout the world, he said, the GDR is indiscriminately being thrown "into a big world pot." The restrictive granting of loans not only makes trade more difficult, but in some areas even impossible. Freund pointed out that so far, the GDR has repaid all its liabilities "to the last pfenning." He also voiced concern over the fact that GDR foreign trade enterprises are registering a steady increase in payments "overdue" to them. Freund believes, however, that if the West German economy is prepared to make the corresponding purchases, inter-German trade will further increase in 1982 as well, on the basis of the basic treaty.

Heinz Weseloh, the first chairman of the FRG/GDR Trade Association, demanded a change in the future towards a goods structure of trade which favors better quality goods. In his opinion, capital equipment, especially products of the machine building sector and electronics products, are accorded too little significance. Compared with these products, the proportion of raw materials and basic materials, which amounts to nearly 60 percent on both sides, is too high.

FAURE MAY SEEK CONTACTS WITH NEW USSR LEADERS

["M.D." report: "Mr Mitterrand Will Apparently Ask Mr Edgar Faure To Establish Contact With New Soviet Leaders"]

[Text] We have learned from a reliable diplomatic source that Mr Mitterrand will ask Mr Edgar Faure to go to Moscow and establish contact with the new Soviet authorities. According to another source, it is true that Mr Edgar Faure is due to go to Moscow soon but that the date of his visit has not been fixed. Moreover, it will only be possible to fix it after the new Soviet Government apparatus has been installed.

The former premier, who speaks Russian, makes numerous journeys abroad on a private, semiofficial or official basis and has cordial relations with many leaders. He is due to return from Cairo on Wednesday, 24 November, and set off for the Morocco the next day. In October 1963 General de Gaulle sent Mr Edgar Faure to Beijing to find out on what conditions France could establish diplomatic relations with the PRC. Mr Edgar Faure's mission resulted in Paris and Beijing exchanging ambassadors in January 1964.

Relations between Paris and Moscow will not be "normal" while the Soviet Army remains in Afghanistan, External Relations Minister Cheysson has said several times. Indeed, Mr Mitterrand has suspended the practice of "regular" Franco-Soviet summits instigated by G. Pompidou and Mr Giscard d'Estaing. However, it would be logical for France, which has important economic exchanges with the USSR (the gas pipeline) to try and take advantage of the change of team in the Kremlin to improve relations between the two countries.

Mr Mitterrand has also sent the U.S. President a personal message on relations between the two countries after the incidents surrounding the lifting of the U.S. embargo on the supplies for the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline. According to AFP, the White House regards it as "conciliatory."

According to a reliable source in Paris, the president of the republic did not indicate any change in French policy. He recalled Franco-U.S. friendship and stressed that France is a particularly good U.S. ally since it has a strong and independent policy. He declared his satisfaction with the lifting of the embargo and added that France intends to keep control over its economic relations. He also expressed satisfaction at the opportunity for a meeting in the near future with Secretary of State Shultz who will come to Europe in early December for the Nato council session in Brussels.

MITTERRAND COMMENTS ON UK FALKLANDS POSITION

NC251255 Paris AFP in English 1240 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 25 (AFP) -- France has never recognized British sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, President Francois Mitterrand said today, in an interview with the liberal evening newspaper LE MONDE. The interview followed a storm in Britain last week when it was learned that an Argentine Navy supply ship had left the French Atlantic port of Saint Nazaire with five Super Etendard planes and 10 Exocet missiles. Two British vessels were sunk by Exocets during the Falklands' war. France announced last August 10 that it had ended the arms embargo clamped on Argentina when hostilities erupted in the South Atlantic. President Mitterrand explained in the interview that France abstained from voting for a resolution backed by South American countries on the Falklands because: "The implications of this resolution would prejudge the outcome of the debate by imputing that Britain was responsible for a 'colonial act'".

Mr Mitterrand said that "geography must not be the only criteria used to appreciate this issue." He said that France would have voted for the resolution "if it had remained within the limits of recommending negotiations and authorising the United Nations secretary general to accept a good-offices mission."

The South American resolution, tabled on November 5, requested Argentina and Britain to resume negotiations to seek a peaceful solution of the "conflict of sovereignty" over the Falklands, called Malvinas by Argentina.

More on Argentina Policy

[Unattributed report: "France Justifies Resumption of Arms Supplies to Argentina"]

[Excerpt] The resumption of French arms aupplies to Argentina this Thursday, 18 November, is merely the implementation of a decision taken last August of which London was informed at the appropriate time, official French circles indicated on Friday, 19 November, after the British reaction to the dispatch of aircraft and Exocet missiles to Buenos Aires.

The Foreign Office expressed its "disappointment" at the announcement on Thursday of the departure from Saint-Nazaire port of a ship sailing for Argentina carrying five Super Etendard aircraft and Exocet air-to-sea missiles of the type which sank several British ships during the Falklands war.

That cargo, official French circles recall, is part of the orders placed by Argentina before the Falklands conflict broke out last April, when France imposed an embargo on arms supplies to Argentina. The lifting of that embargo was announced on 10 August "in view of the end to hostilities" between Britain and Argentina. On that occasion, an External Relations Ministry spokesman specified that the British Government had been informed of the French decision. The Foreign Office had already said then that it was "disappointed" by the lifting of the embargo.

MITTERRAND'S IMPENDING VISIT TO INDIA SURVEYED

BK241032 Hong Kong AFP in English 0901 GMT 24 Nov 82

[By Joel Henri]

[Text] New Delhi, Nov. 24 (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand begins a four-day "goodwill" visit to India Saturday amid Indian expectations of expanded bilateral cooperation in trade, defense, technology and nuclear energy. New Delhi also hopes that President Mitterrand, a Socialist who is known to be sympathetic to Third World causes, will prod other rich nations into greater sensitivity toward problems of the developing world, Indian officials said. President Mitterrand's Socialist administration sees India as one of the key non-aligned nations with which it has a convergence of interests.

The French leader, who will be accompanied by his wife and his ministers for external relations, trade and culture, will have three hours of private talks with Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi during his stay. He is also to address the Indian Parliament and to confer with Indian scientists.

He will be returning Mrs Gandhi's visit to Paris last year. On the agenda of the Mitterrand-Gandhi talks, a ranking Indian source said Monday: "Major world issues such as the looming threat of war created by superpower rivalry, the Middle East, the revival of the North-South dialogue, a better redistribution of resources of international financial institutions will most likely be raised."

"There are no major differences of view between France and India. There is even a fundamental convergence between Indian non-alignment and the French concept of national independence vis-a-vis the superpowers, the source added.

The Indian press meanwhile also highlighted Mr. Mitterrand's reported assertion that India's moral and political weight contributed to the preservation of world peace. The French president underscored the importance France attaches to its ties with New Delhi in a recent meeting with 40 Indian journalists in Paris, the PRESS TRUST OF INDIA reported.

The Gandhi-Mitterrand talks are also expected to focus on defense and nuclear energy cooperation. India has already bought 40 advanced French Mirage 2,000 jets and French Alouette helicopters are built under license in this country. Negotiations are under way to allow India to assemble and then build another 110 Mirages 2,000 and for Indian purchase of Super-Puma helicopters and Exocet missiles of Falkland war fame, the high-level Indian source said.

New Delhi and Paris are also negotiating on French delivery of enriched uranium for India's Tarapur nuclear power plant near Bombay. India turned to France after the United States stopped supplying the uranium because New Delhi, which has not signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, refused to accept inspection of the facilities.

According to the Indian press, the talks have been deadlocked over French insistence on inspection of Tarapur but a solution now appears in sight.

The press has also highlighted disagreements between Paris and New Delhi over the important French naval presence in the Indian Ocean. But informed sources said the issue has had no negative impact on bilateral ties.

New Delhi is also keen on attracting French investment, technology and participation in joint ventures in third countries. the source added.

India is also concerned about the deficits in its trade with France (about 105 million dollars last year) and with the European Economic Community (EEC) (800 million dollars in 1981). It wants French help in curbing them.

These and other issues are to be tackled by the ministers accompanying President Mitterrand: Claude Cheysson (external relations), Michel Jobert (foreign trade) and Jack Lang (culture).

TRADE MINISTER AT GATT OPPOSES FREER TRADE

LD242122 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] Michel Jobert was apparently the star performer at the opening meeting of GATT in Geneva today. This is an organization on international agreements on customs tariffs and trade and comprises 88 countries. GATT preaches free trade while many participants do not agree with this, particularly the French minister of state for foreign trade, who did not hesitate to denounce something which he views as heading into trouble and which could lead to an unprecedented protectionist reaction. Here is Michel Jobert's appeal.

[Begin recording] I have said by the way that we aren't here to celebrate a rite and to repeat yesterday's formula which was in fact that of a trade freeing itself in international activity which was very lively and very steady. So it was understood that trade had to be made free so that international activity could be fully effective. But now the matter is to know if by freeing international trade beyond what was done, which is already considerable, we are not going to create a profound imbalance and ruin some industries and some economies.

This is the question we can ask today, and by the way this is the question which explicitly or not most European countries are asking. I merely want to say that this conference, which some wanted to take place, which was forced upon us in a way, forced upon the other participants, forced against commonsense and forced contrary to the reality of the present -- this conference is taking place at not the best possible moment. [end recording]

Michel Jobert's statement was recorded in Geneva by Francois Vrai who also reports the French foreign trade minister's speech got a rather cool reception at the meeting.

LE MONDE ASSESSES AL-QADHDHAFI'S OAU ROLE

[Editorial: "Mr al-Qadhdhafi and Africa"]

[Text] Following the West Sahara question, Chad's representation is dividing the OAU. Two days of arduous discussions on Tuesday, 16, and Wednesday, 17 November, did not enable the pan-African organization's Council of Ministers, meeting in Tripoli to prepare for the 23 November summit, to decide between the representation claims of the delegation led by Mr Hissein Habre, who has been in power in Ndjamena since 7 June, and that of Mr Goukouni Oueddei, who formed a rebel "government" in Tibesti at the end of October. The ministers were to resume their discussions this Thursday afternoon and, should the disagreement persist, would refer the question to the heads of state and of government.

There is reason to think that this affair is no longer concerned merely with accreditation procedure. It has taken a much more political turn, with the support of Libya, without which Mr Goukoun Oueddei could not attempt anything serious. Mr Oueddei is now staging a rebellion in a remote, underpopulated desert region on the edge of the Aozou Strip which has been militarily occupied by Libya for more than 10 years. Since September, the rest of Chad has been controlled by Mr Hissein Habre's administration, and at the beginning of October he took part in the Franco-African summit as head of state and has since provided his country with a provisional government and provisional institutions.

In addition, the Ndjamena government represents Chad in the international organizations, especially the United Nations under whose auspices a meeting of creditors will start in Geneva on 29 November to help that devastated country to rebuild.

Nobody can be surprised to see Colonel al-Qadhdhafi help his Chadian proteges try to regain power. To explain his refusal to attend the Franco-African summit in Kinshasa, he had condemned its "neocolonial" character. He renewed his attacks on that institution, described as "scandalous" on Monday in his opening speech at the OAU Council of Ministers meeting. The Libyan leader is never hesitant in disconcerting people. He preferred to call on Mr 'Arafat to "commit suidice" than to see the PLO withdraw from Beirut and refused to take part in the Fes summit on Lebanon rather than question his "radical"options.

But he was thought to be sufficiently anxious to accede to the annual chairmanship of the OAU -- a job reserved for the summit host -- for him to envisage substantial concessions when necessary. In an attempt to save "his" summit for the first time at the beginning of August, had he not threatened to cut off supplies to the Saharans, thus hoping to secure their delegation's withdrawal? Had he not forced Mr Goukouni Oueddei to give up his chair to Mr Hissein Habre's representative?

In these conditions there is reason to wonder on which African states Colonel al-Qadhdhafi can in fact rely for support of his approach, at a time when the main aim is to consolidate a pan-African organization weakened by the Saharan affair.

We can hope that the OAU will overcome this new crisis. But it is difficult to see what it will gain from being chaired by a man who so clearly places his own interests before those of pan-Africanism.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH YAR CONTINUE IN PARIS

GF241512 San'a' Domestic Service in Arabic 1200 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] Talks resumed today between the YAR and France in Paris. The YAR side in these talks is headed by Brother 'Ali Lutfi ath-Thawr, minister of foreign affairs and member of the Standing Committee, and the French side is headed by Claude Cheysson, minister of external relations.

During the meeting which lasted 3 hours, the two sides discussed bilateral relations and reviewed the steps taken so far in political, economic, cultural, agricultural and health fields and the results reached by the two sides during the preparatory talks held at the French Foreign Relations Ministry yesterday morning. SABA' NEWS AGENCY has learned that, during the talks, the two sides reached practical steps that can give momentum to relations between the two countries in various fields of cooperation, in addition to the identity of views on the Palestinian issue.

The brother minister of foreign affairs and member of the Standing Committee expressed our country's appreciation for France's position toward the Palestinian issue and explained our country's view regarding it -- the stance which is based on the decisions of all the Arabs in the Fes summit. During the Fes summit, the Arab views were identical and [word indistinct] all Arab efforts on the national and international levels for the sake of reaching a settlement of the issue of the Palestinian people in a way that safeguards their legitimate rights to establish their independent state under the leadership of the PLO, the legitimate and sole representative of the Palestinian people.

Our delegation heard a detailed explanation of France's stance regarding the Palestinian issue and the issues of liberation and maintenance of peace in the zones of tension in the world. During the talks, the two sides also exchanged views on many international issues of mutual concern.

Claude Cheysson hosted a dinner party at the Foreign Relations Ministry yesterday in honor of the brother minister of foreign affairs and member of the Standing Committee and the delegation accompanying him, which was attended by highranking officials at the French Foreign Relations Ministry and our charge d'affairs in Paris. Following the dinner party, the two ministers held a closed working session in order to finalize the results agreed upon during their talks on bilateral relations.

MOROCCO ON SALE OF U.S. PLANES TO SPAIN

LD251156 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 2000 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Excerpts] The future attack and combat aircraft project, the purchase of 84 F-18A combat and attack aircraft to modernize the Spanish Air Force, has generated some interest over the past few hours after the visit to Washington by Spanish Under Secretary for Defense Eduardo Serra. The visit had only one item on the agenda, the postponement of the signing of the letter of intent for purchase of the 84 aircraft.

The purchase of the F-18A aircraft led the Moroccan Embassy in Spain to make a series of points in an official note issued this evening. In the note it says that the Kingdom of Morocco has not put any kind of pressure on the United States concerning the sale of these aircraft to Spain, given that Spain and Morocco are linked to the United States by mutual agreements and consequently destined to safeguard common interests in an area which is vital to both countries.

PSOE'S GUERRA SETS 3-YEAR EEC ENTRY DEADLINE

LD241218 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Excerpt] A late piece of news: Statements and a threat on Belgian radio and television having the signature of the PSOE. Asuncion Valdes, our correspondent in Brussels, says that Alfonso Guerra [PSOE deputy secretary general] threatened the EEC to reply yes to Spain's request for entry, or to forget it.

[Begin Valdes relay] Good evening. Either we join the EEC in the next 3 years or the future Spanish Socialist Government will shut the door. This was the essence of what Alfonso Guerra said in a Radio-Television Belge broadcast this evening. Replying in French to the question from a correspondent in Madrid, the PSOE second-in-command said that in a short while the PSOE would study the possibility of joining the EEC. If we do not join in the next 3 years, he added, this possibility will cease to exist. Membership would no longer be of interest to either Spain or Europe itself.

These statements by Alfonso Guerra form part of a special report which Radio-Television Belge will broadcast on the occasion of the arrival in power of the Spanish Socialists. Belgain radio decided to release the news now by broadcasting an excerpt from his statements. The PSOE is not prepared to wait indefinitely for a yes from the EEC. [end relay]

GOVERNMENT OFFICE TAKES ACTION AGAINST PAPERS

PA252238 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1314 GMT 23 Nov 82

[text] Madrid, 23 Nov (EFE) -- The Spanish Attorney General's Office initiated actions against two newspapers today on the charge that they are defending terrorism and inciting to rebellion. The newspaper EGIN, which represents the Basque radical left, was withdrawn from circulation after the newspaper published an ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] communique today trying to justify an attack staged in Guipuzcoana de Renteneria on 18 November, in which three people were injured.

The order to withdraw the newspaper, issued by a national judge [juez de la audiencia nacional], was based upon a complaint lodged by the Attorney General's Office, which feels that the article could be interpreted as an apology for terrorism. In addition, the Attorney General's Office filed a complaint against the Madrid newspaper EL ALCAZAR because of two articles it published in October that could be interpreted as incitement to rebellion.

KING PROPOSES GONZALEZ FOR PRIME MINISTER

[Text] The king has now selected his candidate for prime minister: The Socialist Felipe Gonzalez. The head of state's consultations with the different parliamentary leaders concludes tonight and a few minutes ago the speaker of the Congress, Gregorio Peces-Barba, was called to the Zarzuela Palace. At the end of his meeting with the king, Peces-Barba made a statement.

In connection with the consultations undertaken by his majesty the king to propose a candidate for prime minister, the task which falls to me as speaker of the congress is to go to the King to be told of his proposal. This is what happened. He gave me the name of Don Felipe Gonzalez Marques. [passage indistinct]

[Question] As regards the investiture, could you please tell us, Sr Peces-Barba, when this will take place?

[Answer] [sentence indistinct] The investiture session will begin on Tuesday [30 November] at 1630 with the candidate's speech. It will then continue [words indistinct] on Wednesday and I think that the voting in accordance with the time limits laid down by the rules for the length of replies, could be held [words indistinct] in the night and so the swearing in will probably be held on Thursday. KING'S SPEECH AT INAUGURATION OF CORTES

[Address by King Juan Carlos to Spanish Cortes on the official opening of the new legislature -- live]

[Text] Mr President of the Congress of Deputies, Mr President of the Senate, Mr Prime Minister and ministers of the acting government, ladies and gentlemen, deputies and senators.

On inaugurating the new legislature of the Cortes, at this solemn ceremony of great democratic significance, I should like my first words to contain greetings to all our people, greetings conveyed via its legitimate representatives who meet today for the first time to begin carrying out the gree and peaceful mandate of Spaniards. As the repository of the constitutional functions of the crown, at this moment I believe that it is the Spanish people, the calm, long-suffering, exemplary and magnificant Spanish people, that we have to serve with total devotion, who are here with us all and with the utmost right, are the greatest protagonists of this event. It is therefore you, the exponents of politics in the deepest and most classical sense which can be given to politics, the sublime art and task which embraces all that which may influence the prosperity of peoples; it is you who have to translate into positive and effective laws the hopes of our fellow countrymen and the responsibility they have given you.

As I have said on previous occasions, democracy is sustained essentially by the task which had been assigned to you. Your power is open, representative and complex. It can be permitted neither weakness nor hesitation. In it resides public stability and through it is channelled the realization of the objectives of the permanence and strength of the state. For this reason, if the construction of democracy and the consolidation of the system of law, which the Spanish people have assumed with determination and devotion, are to be carried out without haste and without delay, it is the duty of these chambers to moderate the pace, harmonize the problems and their solutions, and establish in legality that which is most appropriate for the achievement of common coexistence.

I believe that we have reason to be thankful and satisfied at the orderly, free and peaceful way in which the will of the Spanish people was expressed on a broad scale during the general election which has given rise to the constitution of these chambers. It is a demonstration of the fact that in the mind of the people, the idea has taken root that it is necessary to participate resolutely in political activity which has to be exercised for the good of the community in order to achieve coexistence in peace and liberty.

However, it is also the time to adopt the intention of responding to this explicit expression and to become worthy of the trust invested. It is the time to invoke the need to practice, day by day, hour by hour, in the regulated process of the task which befalls the Cortes the supreme virtue of all politics, which is prudence. Without this as the balance between wisdom and sentiment, the laws which we need would not be possible. I ask you to apply it without hesitation in this Cortes which opens at a crucial time in our history.

The acute sensibility of the Spanish people enables it to judge conduct, reject mistakes or respond favorably to wise decisions. It will not allow personal interests to prevail over collective interests, and knows perfectly well how to distinguish between that which is fundamental and that which is secondary or accessory. Let us be aware of the fact that in the order which this people has chosen, there exists the possibility for it freely to express its opinion, be this to congratulate or sanction conduct, or to express discouragement and rejection, or hope and faith in future ways of proceeding. Let us all be worthy of its trust and endeavor to resolve in harmony the gravest and most widespread problems, because the people also know how to perceive the important objectives on which there could be broad agreement, the great issues which we all have to agree to try and resolve together, the unchanging values in whose acknowledgement there exists a unanimity of views.

I tell you frankly that I have great faith in our future. From total and sincere dedication to the service of the common good which you are here to exercise, must flow well-being for the people, vigor for the state which sustains our historical vitality and a clear view to the future.

I think we are embarking on the normalization of that future. A clear decision has been made by the Spanish people that never again can the wishes of a minority, backed up by force, prevail over the freely and peacefully expressed will of the majority of the people. The time has come for us to consolidate what we have so far achieved and push forward with firmness and certainly along the road of normalizing our state based on law, For us to learn to live in peace without hatred or bitterness, recognizing the freedom of others at one and the same time as the guarantee and yet the limiting factor of our own freedom. Between us we must strengthen the concept of the state and its permanence and its manner of functioning over and above the vicissitudes which in fact are one of the elements which help to consolidate that very state.

Transfers of political power decided by the people are normal occurrences in democracy. They serve precisely ot encourage support for the idea of the permanence of the state, of obedience to its rules, and of observance of an order which far from being disturbed, is rather confirmed through the alterations which are accepted and through the work which those designated perform in fulfilling their lofty mission. Respect for the law and a sense of interest in defending the concept of the state must be inculcated in all, regardless of whatever political direction the Spanish people may have chosen at a given time and for a fixed period as an expression of its will. I am, therfore, sure that the legislature opening today will work on these generous and broad objectives to which our people are entitled. Your right as representatives has been won at elections which were a model of participation, order and freedom.

The calm and peaceful way in which triumph was celebrated, matched with appropriate and understanding acknowledgement of defeat -- defeat which can serve as an incentive to fresh efforts -- the merits, which must not be forgotten, of those who in the past phase have contributed happily to the difficult period of the transition, the sincere and effective cooperation between the outgoing and incoming teams in a transfer of power, the normal progress of which must not be affected by radical attitudes -- all these are circumstances which light up before us and before Spain in general expectations of continuity and hope. For this I congratulate you and take great pleasure in it. Above all, I congratulate the Spanish people.

This lofty institution contains one of the bases for the consolidation of democracy. The most attractive and prestigious function of the political parties is precisely to work, on the basis of their representive power, for the national interest and the strengthening of the state. Through this work, and with that lofty aim in mind, the political parties themselves are strengthened much more than if one aims simply to strengthen them alone, because the most dynamic objective of that national interest is to ensure the permanence of a state which is solid and consistent, and to cement together a juridical structure which will safeguard the fatherland and protect the men and women who are its strength and voice, against any weakening of the body of the nation.

Our democracy, the project that has been created for a life of freedom and respect for others, must therefore be supported on the pillars of a firm state modelled and organized in such a way as to give strength and solidity, of a state which will be permanent and untouched by the vagaries inevitably generated by politics, which will be rooted in an unshakeable context, creative in its consistency and providing protection for the forward progress of the institutions; and reciprocally, one in which the institutions provide protection for the forward progress of the state itself toward those histoical objectives which the crown earnestly and unwaveringly encourages. We need the continuity, effectiveness and oneness of the state to ensure by its inherent nature the springs of democracy, and we need it to be the guarantee and support of that democracy. This is because opportunities to exercise day by day our ideals of freedom, which can no longer be renounced, would be ineffective without such a state worthy always of respect, defended by all and unaffected by contingencies and changes.

The greatness of the system and its capacity to serve, lie in the agreement shared by society and those who represent it, in the part played by the institutions in consolidating and strengthening the state; in the dedication of the armed forces and security forces to defending the order established by the Constitution and the political reality which the implementation of that Constitution gives rise to at different times; in the loyalty of all officials and all whose work lies in these various areas; and in the serious and responsible actions of the media in the interests of all so as to sustain the framework and the beautiful fabric on which harmonious existence today, and in the future is depicted and comes to life.

The fixing of that indisputable framework which will affirm the security and growth of institutional democratic life is the great task to which you have to address yourselves. In that great undertaking you -- we all -- have an unquestionable part, because it is that undertaking which will make it possible to attain the great national policies which the times call for and which cannot be overruled by the threats in this sometimes troubled world, or by the feverish madness of groups who operate on the basis of violence, which is incomprehensible and tragic.

Terrorism is a shadow over our communal life, causing confusion, pain and bloodshed. It has shown a monstrous preference for feeding on the armed forces and the security forces, the fundamental and decisive bulk of whom, that part which characterizes them -- and I say this to you with great feeling -- has always done honor to the profession which is one of discipline and sacrifice; and which, with its loyal obedience to the legitimate authorities, does honor also to the society and the nation to which it belongs.

To be able to accept the senseless and cowardly killing of one's closest companions and to do so with weapons in one's hand, in glorious silence, is one of the most beautiful pages ever written in the world by the soldierly spirit. Anyone who thinks, suggests or states outright with gross malice, that the armed forces, opposed to terrorism, could root it out and end it by suspending or changing the state based on law, is wholly mistaken. That, as we know only too well, is precisely the master stroke which the terrorists are hoping to provoke. To take advantage for dark purposes of the pain of a soldier in order to incite him to transgress the principle which lies at the root of his being a soldier, is equivalent to trying to implant in his will that same blind and despotic mechanism which moves the terrorist.

With their profound sense of patriotism, the armed forces and the security forces constitute in their totality the firm and honorable guardian of the state based on law against terrorism and against any aggressor. From this podium today, I wish to voice my admiration, respect and acknowledgement of them. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen deputies, ladies and gentlemen senators, as this new stage in the life of the Cortes begins I wish to express thanks for long hours and strenuous efforts given by all who have taken part in the work of the previous chambers and who even suffered violent attack within these walls. It is a great satisfaction for me to open this legislature which will undoubtedly produce a multiplicity of initiatives and results, and from which the Spanish people, with calm impatience, await services which cannot be postponed for the achievement of progress in all areas and the strengthening of their peace of mind.

Your precise job consists in finding the right way to meet the challenge which present circumstances pose to us as a people. What is needed to attain political strength is fully concerted free wills, grouped consistently, simultaneously concerted ideas, plans and ways of carrying them out. This immense richness and constant process of imagination, planning and realization, this effort by all to make certain the present and create the future, and the vehemence with which opinions are expressed and clash: All this does not give rise to disorder or social warfare; it is rather simply the exercise of freedom. I call on you, each of you, in the ordered interplay of parliamentary differences, to reply in the appropriate measure to the challenge of building an ever more prosperous nation which will be ours to bequeath as a treasure, as a responsibility and a risk, and as a burden of honor to our children.

It is your job, by means of just, appropriate, harmonizing and prudent laws, to return the confidence the people have placed in the Cortes. Asking you to rise to this great task, I declare the legislature open. [applause]

PCE DOCUMENT ANALYZES DEFEAT, NEW GOVERNMENT

PM250815 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 12-18 Nov 82 pp 12-17

[Document approved by 6-7 November PCE Central Committee meeting: "The 28 October Election and the New Political Situation"]

[Text] The election was a genuine popular earthquake which has transformed the political map of the transition. The Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] has collapsed and the PCE has suffered a grave defeat, despite the self-sacrificing effort of thousands and thousands of members, friends and supporters of the party. The nationalist and regionalist parties, except in the Basque country and Catalonia, have been submerged. There has emerged, as absolute victor, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], and, in second place, the Popular Alliance, which from a paltry number of deputies in the last Cortes now holds 105 seats. The results have exceeded the opinion polls, although the prevailing trends were already emerging in them.

These results pose the need for profound criticism and self-criticism and changes in the PCE. Before entering into this, the Central Committee deems it necessary to state that the PSOE's victory represents an advance of democracy and contains possibilities of real changes in Spain's political and social life.

The PCE, with the mediocrity of its election results, but with the reality of its influence in the most dynamic sectors of the working class and the people's masses, declares itself prepared to firmly support the PSOE government in any measure of change and progress and, of course, against any attempt at the blocking of its activity by the right in the Chamber and in social life. The PCE will act in this new stage of the transition by confirming its nature as a workers' and people's party of the Marxist revolutionary left, committed to the Constitution and democracy.

PSOE, Recipient of Pact

Our policy of cooperation among the leftwing and progressive forces is not over. In practice, what has occurred is the PSOE's transformation to some extent into the recipient of a kind of front of democratic social sectors. The PSOE has kept and increased the workers' and leftwing votes and has won over a considerable part of the reformist bourgeoisie's vote. It has achieved this, rather than with a direct pledge to the latter, through the pact with the major economic and institutional powers and with the rightwing party, which it has assured that its conduct will be aimed at "making Spain work." The PSOE has already undertaken to grant Manuel Fraga Iribarne status similar to that which the leader of the opposition has in Britain, with the status of shadow "prime minister." It is clear that, in view of Spain's present day situation, the consequences of this measures could go far beyond the significance which the British institution has.

The working class and the left have accepted this pact with their vote, setting above its medium-term dangers the immediate advantage of a change, and probably with the conscious idea or intuition that this pact could be a guarantee against the danger of a coup.

Right's Strength

The UCD's inability to implement reforms and to guarantee the state's security, demonstrated even more under Calvo-Sotelo's leadership, has caused its failure and ruin and has contributed decisively to the phenomenon of the useful vote for the PSOE on the party of all those who wished, above all to prevent the success of Fraga's hard-line right, or "Francoism," as an election poster said.

Basically, the election result confirms a constant factor which has dominated the transition since the referencum on the reform in 1976; The great strength of the right, initially channeled toward the UCD and now taken up by the Popular Alliance, and the spirit of moderation prevailing among the people's masses and the leftwing sectors.

Under these conditions it would be wrong to say that the transition is over. The configuration of the democratic state of the autonomies is still in its infancy; the democratization of the administration and of the state apparatus has not begun, and, moreover, we are in the midst of a world economic crisis whose end cannot be seen and which is having catastrophic repercussions on the weak and obsolete Spanish structures. What can be asserted is that we are in a new political stage which is currently characterized, on the one hand, by an obvious democratic advance, and, on the other, by a grave bipolarization which requires a review of our tactics.

Difficulties in Establishing PCE

Since the transition began, the PCE has met with grave difficulties in establishing itself among the broad masses of Spanish society, despite having been the most active party in the anti-Francoist struggle and the one which began the policy of national reconciliation 20 years before it crystallized into the political change; and also despite having striven to carry out a policy which sought to take the social realities into account and which, through democratic concentration, sought to achieve positions of power for the working class in cooperation between it and the reformist bourgeoisie.

It is indisputable that NATO's veto on Communist Parties' holding government office in its area exerted an influence unfavorable to the PCE's growth. Another factor which carried weight is our emergence into legality coincided with the lowest point of international communist influence, owing to the crisis of the systems inspired by the Soviet model and to events in international politics which darkened communism's image. Our eurocommunist line and desire to carry out an independent and democratic policy brought us into confrontation with U.S. imperialism and brought about the political and ideological attack by the party which had played a leading role in the Communist International.

However, those factors, despite being important, were not the decisive ones: The decisive factors lay in the fact that it was not possible to make the democratic break; that the democratic institutions entered into an obvious conflict with economic and institutional de facto powers, which translated their hostility toward the democratic change into a kind of veto on the PCE; and that that veto has weighed like a constant threat on the democratic institutions and induced the people's masses, bearing the historical memory of the civil war and the subsequent repression, not to view our party as the instrument of change in this situation.

The PSOE leadership team's policy, instead of striving to change this situation, as would have been in the general interest of the working class and democratic consolidation in Spain, has exploited it thoroughly from a narrow party viewpoint to reduce and eliminate the PCE's competition by rejecting any cooperation with us, except when, following the municipal elections, it was necessary in order to take over a large number of Spanish mayorships.

Two Poles of Election

With the existence of the PSOE's veto on the Communist Party, together with a program of change which in many respects promised to fulfill the aspirations of broad people's masses, coming from a party which already possessed a broad electoral base, the electorate has chosen the option which it deemed safest, giving victory to the PSOE' tactics.

This victory has been possible because of the convergence with the tactics of the right, which was also seeking bipolarization, aiming at two options: Either to defeat the PSOE and take power after 28 October, or to place itself as the only alternative to the Socialist Government in a subsequent election. In this way the PSOE's triumph also coincides with a dangerous rise of the right. The positive pole of the election outcome appears intertwined with the other, negative pole which materialized 28 October.

Influence of 27 October Coup

In view of this bipolarization, the strong trend toward the useful vote had already manifested itself in the Andalusian election, and perhaps, in the opposite direction, previously in the Galician election.

It was clear to the party leadership and our members that our vote was going to fall, although not to the extent which we saw 28 October.

Our aim was to secure a parliamentary group with 15 deputies or 5 percent of the votes. The opinion polls up to 20 October, both those conducted on our behalf by the Sigma 2 Enterprise and those conducted by the Alef Agency, gave us strong grounds for expecting those results. The campaign conducted by the party has a positive influence; however, between the last opinion polls and 28 October, there was a further swing of Communist votes to the PSOE. Our analysis leads to the conclusion that the reports or rumors about the military coup, troop movements and defensive measures at the Zarzuela Palace gave rise, in view of the fear that a vote of fear would help the Popular Alliance, to the intention to guarantee at all costs the PSOE's victory, which was viewed as the only real possibility of countering that danger.

Disillusionment at Lack of Break

The external factors certainly do not in themselves explain the PCE's election defeat, although they have also influenced the events which have occurred in our party to some extent.

Because of our role in the anti-Francoist struggle, the idea that we could be the dominant force of change was very widespread in the party. When this occurred through reform and not through a break and the dominant forces were the UCD on the right and the PSOE on the left -- the two reformist parties -- the fact created unease and despondency in our ranks, which were partially surmounted by our party's ability to operate between the PSOE and the UCD during the period of the Moncloa Pacts and the consensus.

At the Rome plenum, we had prepared the party for the attainment of legality, but not for the difficult situation in which we would remain for a long time under the conditions of the reform. The Moncloa Pacts themselves were also an issue on which unanimity in the party could not be achieved. A "leftwing" reaction occurred regarding them, as well as concerning the policy of consensus. These stances were intertwined with disagreements as regards the conception of eurocommunism.

An interpretation of eurocommunism also began to develop, which in the conception of the party and its policy, was leading virtually to stances undifferentiated from social democracy. This created on the one hand, a confrontation among those who declared themselves eurocommunists, with the ultrarenewalists' group breaking away, and, on the other, a sectarian reaction.

From all these factors there emerged the crises undergone by the party, which could be defined as a confrontation between a tendency inclined to maintain the PCE's historical constant factors without renewal, and another attracted by the model of the second international, which at one point even conspired against the majority of the party and its leadership's stance to the extent of threatening a rift and a split by not accepting democratic centralism.

External Manipulations

It may be pointed out that the PCE's crisis has been the object of external manipulations only comparable with those against Suarez during the period when he was ousted from leadership of the government and of the UCD. The PSOE had a very grave crisis which led to the removal from its leadership of personalities such as Enrique Tierno Galvan, Luis Gomez Llorente, Pablo Castellano and professor Bustelo -- that is, the people representing the socialist left -- at a congress at which only the regional secretaries voted, and that reached the public as a success for the image of Felipe Gonzalez, the PSOE and even the PSOE's internal democracy.

If the leftwing stance had triumphed in the PSOE, the image presented by the outcome would probably have been precisely the opposite. To move the PSOE increasingly rightward and attempt to disrupt the PCE -- that is, the minimize the left -- has been a policy of the ruling classes and not exclusively internal phenomena.

Internal Mistakes

The weaknesses and shortcomings of the party leadership's work -- including the period when those who left voluntarily and those who were penalized were taking part in it -- have been considerable in several fields and were made clear at the 10th Congress.

The fundamental factor was undoubtedly the estrangement between the leadership and the grassroots and the weakening of the party's work in the mass movements. The transition from clandestinity to legality caused a massive shift of cadres to the democratic institutions and, at the same time, an enormous concentration in the higher intermediate bodies, and, as a result, the weakening of our presence in the grassroots organizations and in the mass movements. At the same time, a withdrawal of the trade union cadres from specific party work, neglect of the cadres who remained in the mass movements, and, as a result, the departure of some of them, were occuring.

Another of the weaknesses was the lack of a politically and quantitatively strong organization apparatus, coinciding with the development of considerable centrifugal trends which led to questioning the very idea of a PCE. The central leadership and other leaderships at various levels have not succeeded in achieving a standard of effectivenessand efficiency essential to any party, but even more so to a Communist Party.

In the sector of culture we have been unable to readjust our work during the period of Francoism to that of democracy. We have been unable to help formulate an independent blueprint for political and cultural action by those forces. There have even been mistakes such as believing that the party itself was the instrument of the alliance of the forces of labor and culture, disregarding the great majority of intellectuals, artists and professionals who are not communists but are still the forces of culture. We have sometimes mistreated our own artist comrades by using them at functions which lowered their professional standards.

Inadequate Formulation of Eurocommunist Strategy

The ideological struggle has been another of our great shortcomings, reflecting the inadequate formulation of our eurocommunist strategy, together with the pressures for maintaining a traditional party or because of the attraction of the Second International. Our education and training work in the party has thereby suffered from grave weaknesses. The same has applied to our information for the party and the masses and propaganda.

But since the 10th Congress, the internal crisis has prevented normal functioning of the party leadership. We have been paralyzed to a large extent by that situation and by the reproduction of the crisis in our Central Committee, and we have also been harmed by the fact that our leadership is still more like a coordination center of various national and regional parties than a central leadership. As long as the party leadership itself does not emerge from the crisis, as long as the crisis is constantly reproducing itself among us, we will not succeed in surmounting it in the party. Likewsie, it is essnetial that the leadership bodies establish themselves as a real central leadership.

These negative aspects, the unresolved crises and the weaknesses in the work of the central leadership and of the leaderships at other levels have gravely influenced our election results, which, if all this had not happened, could have been better than those achieved.

Validity of Our Broad Outlines

A new political situation has been created in the country, although the problems of the previous situation, such as unemployment, putschism and terrorism and the U.S. pressure on national policy, persist within it and could worsen. The PCE must respond to that new political situation following a defeat, under conditions more difficult for a calm formulation and with the danger that the party's crisis will be reopened with far graver dimensions.

The Central Committee believes that the broad outlines of the program which we upheld in the election campaign are valid, and that we must adjust our work to them in Parliament and in society, since the leftwing vote for the PSOE instead of the PCE is not so much a rejection of our program as an expression of greater confidence in the PSOE's prospects in this situation.

Our proposals on unemployment, the defense of freedoms and the struggle against terrorism; the defense of peace and withdrawal from NATO; our demands in favor of a means of bringing young people into employment and education and of young people's right to live their youth to the full; the defense of women's dignity and real equality and of pensioners' living conditions; bringing agricultural workers in line with other workers in unemployment benefits, comprehensive agrarian reform which protect family property and make it possible to improve peasants' living conditions; action to guarantee the organization of the state of the autonomies; in a word, the contents of our program should serve as a guideline for our activity in society and in Parliament.

However, the proposal which we have made of a democratic front must adopt other methods appropriate to the situation which has been created, without transforming its essence, which is basically the need for the cooperation of the workers, united with the sectors of the reformist bourgeoisie in tackling the country's problems, whose gravity has not disappeared despite the election.

The PSOE does not need our votes in order to govern, although we will give it our votes in everything that means advance, progress and defense of democracy. However, it is in society itself, in the various institutions, in the social movements, that we should also make the greatest effort to maintain at all levels a relationsship of cordiality and unity with the socialist comrades and with all the forces of progress, striving to strengthen permanent citizens' participation with mass political initiatives.

The Communist Party intends to act in this new stage as a consistent Marxist and revolutionary left, committed to the Constitution and democracy, with political initiative and with determination to help a real change to take place.

The Central Committee decides to convene the party's National Conference 17 through 19 December to define more specifically the tactics to be carried out in this situation and to draw up our plan of action with a view to the coming municipal and regional elections.

Debate Within Unity

The Central Committee believes that under the current circumstances, while implementing an open policy toward society, it is essential to maintain the unity of the party and of its leadership bodies, over and above the disagreements which may exist on some aspects.

This is not inconsistent with the need for the harsh lesson of this defeat to lead us to a specific examination of the inadequacies and shortcomings of methods and personnel and the promotions and dismissals necessary for the party's better functioning at teh central level and all other levels. However, those measures should not be adopted hastily, in an emotional moment, but calmly and quietly. What we have lost we will not recover in a day or with a gesture; it will be the object of a work of time, perserverance, intelligence and steadfastness. Many members who have worked in this campaign with admirable self-sacrifice are aware of this and are demanding decisions taken calmly, and especially that the party and its leadership do not continue to lacerate themselves.

Recover PCE's Image

During these days of the election campaign and afterward, more than a few comrades who had left, have worked again in the party and taken back their membership cards. Most of the 825,000 votes which we have received are firm ideological votes from people who could be party members and who, if we know how to work with them, can extend and increase our social influence. Among them there is also a sector, composed particularly of professionals and artists, who without being communists deem a strong PCE necessary for there to be freedom and progress. To all those who have acted in this way we express our gratitude and the promise that we will work not to disappoint the confidence which they have shown us at such an unfavorable time.

The votes for the PSOE went not out of hostility toward the PCE, but out of a conception of the usefulness and effectiveness of the vote in this situation. In order to recover them, we must recover the image of responsibility, unity and discipline, the image of a revolutionary party which had become obscured with our crisis. Nor can we be forgetful that many socialist votes which carried over from previous elections, are votes from workers and professionals who feel sympathy for the PCE, who want unity with us and who will help us; We are aware that we have a broad circle of friends in society who want our recovery for Spain's good and progress.

Taking all this into account, the Central Committee asserts its confidence in the party's recovery and in the surmounting of the crisis and of the defeat, and lays down a 6-month period to finalize and implement the measures of renewal in the party's various leadership structures, from top to bottom, and for setting up the operative bodies necessary in order to ensure the best possible contact between leaderships and grassroots, and between party and workers movement, party and young people, party and women's movement, party and forces of culture, party and social movements and instruments of propaganda and training and so forth.

This work must be accompanied by an effort at all levels and by all members to the same end. The Central Committee summons all party members and all those who realize the need to joint or rejoin, to a new militant effort to surmount this difficult time for the Communist Party -- the party of democracy and socialism.

DENMARK

PREMIER COMMENTS ON FISHING DISPUTE WITH UK

PM251349 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 23 Nov 82 (Financial Supplement) p 2

[Nils Eric Boesgaard dispatch: "Schlueter in Downing Street"]

[Text] London -- "I cannot imagine that 1 January will come and go without our succeeding in finding a solution to the fisheries problems," Prime Minister Poul Schlueter said at a press conference at the Danish Embassy in London. Schlueter was in London at the invitation of the British prime minister, and yesterday evening was Mrs Thatcher's guest at a working dinner at 10 Downing Street.

During the press conference British journalists launched a tough attack on the prime minister. The questions dealt almost exclusively with Denmark's rejection of the new EEC fisheries arrangements, which has caused much anger in Britain, where there is open talk of a new cod war and of mobilizing the fleet against Danish fishermen.

Poul Schlueter gave a detailed explanation of the Danish position and showed graphics, made by the prime minsiter himself, on some orange-colored cardboard. It showed Denmark's, Britain's and the other EEC nations' shares of annual catches in the North Sea. "I am willing to accept that the largest share should go to Britain, but it cannot be intended that all the additional fish which the British have been allowed should be taken from us," he said.

When asked whether he would encourage Danish fishermen to ignore British fishing regulations, the prime minster replied, "no!" but at the same time he warned the British that Denmark was prepared to go to the EEC court. According to the Treaty of Rome, members have free access to each other's fishing waters -- and it would be unpleasant for the British if the arrest and sentencing of Danish fishing boats were to be quashed by the EEC court, he said.

FOREIGN MINISTER ON OPPOSITION TO NUCLEAR FREEZE

[Solveig Rodsgaar report: "Political Showdown on Danish 'No' to UN Resolution"]

[Text] The government runs the risk of difficulties tomorrow when it will be forced to admit that a majority in the Folketing Foreign Affairs Committee is opposed to its decision that Denmark together with the other NATO nations will vote against a draft resolution proposed by Sweden, India and Mexico calling for a freeze on nuclear arsenals.

The Social Democrats, the Socialist People's Party, the Radical Liberals and the Left Socialist Party are opposed to the government's decision. It is the Social Democrats who have called for an emergency meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee tomorrow, because they want to demand that Denmark abstain when the draft resolution is presented to the United Nations. If the government does not go along with the majority in the Foriegn Affairs Committee, the Socialist People's Party will try to raise the matter in the Folketing, so that the government could be toppled. The Social Democrats have not yet decided whether they want to have the matter raised in the chamber.

Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE: "It cannot be right for the government to be pressured by the Social Democrats to pursue a foreign and security policy to the left of the policy the Social Democrats pursue when they are in office, simply to make it possible for the Social Democrats to pander to their left wing. We will not allow ourselves to be pressured into dissociating ourselves from our NATO partners -- something which the Social Democrats themselves did not do when they were in office." Of the controversial resolution, the foreign minister said that if Denmark supports the resolution 'it would mean a freeze of the Soviet Union's nuclear supremacy and would destroy the possibility of real nuclear disarmament. We want disarmament and not a freeze. We consider this proposal to be a Soviet propaganda ruse for which some of the neutral countries have unfortunately fallen."

Social Democratic foreign affairs spokesman Lasse Budtz said that he is unable to see that the government would lose anything through following the majority so that Denmark would abstain at the United Nations. The Socialist Left Party's Gert Petersen said that he definitely expects the government to go with the majority in the Folketing Foreign Affairs Committee, even though it is not obliged to do so. Since tomorrow the foreign minister is in Brussels and the prime minister is in London, acting Prime and Foreign Minister Henning Christophersen will attend the Foreign Affairs Committee meeting.

SCHLÜETER TRIP: AREAS OF FRICTION WITH U.S.

PM241147 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 20 Nov 82 p 8

[Editorial: "To The United States!"]

[Text] A few weeks before the end of Denmark's chairmanship of the EEC, Prime Minister Poul Schlueter will fly to Washington for talks with President Reagan in the White House. Anker Jorgensen should really have been there at the commencement of Denmark's EEC chairmanship -- but Reagan does not like Anker.

We wish Poul Schlueter a pleasant journey. He can, of course, take with him Danish best wishes, but if Reagan does indicate that the U.S. view of Denmark has altered because of the change of government, please point out that this change does not mean there has been any change in the general view of Reagan. Large sections of the Danish population still hold the view that Reagan's United States has played an offensive role in El Salvador, for example, and that Reagan's actions vis-a-vis the Soviet-European natural gas project seem most unwise. Add that we for our part, have not interfered in his massive grain sales to the Soviet Union. Tell him that U.S.-European relations have fallen on hard times in the Reagan era, and if China is mentioned, point out the sad fact that Reagan has wasted the achievements of his predecessors. If there is time, tell Reagan also that if he wanted to punish Anker by not inviting him, this resulted in a positive reaction in Denmark -- for Anker.

FISHING QUOTAS WITH USSR FOR 1983 ESTABLISHED

PM251115 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 20 Nov 82 p 11

[Kjell Dragnes report: "Norway Wins Largest Fishing Quota"]

[Text] Norway was able to push through all its views in the talks on next year's Barents and Norwegian Sea fighing quotas and got the lion's share of the cod, capelin and haddock quotas allocated. At the same time the Soviet Union has been granted access to fish all its cod quota in the Norwegian economic zone.

The main question, which had still not been clearly answered by Soviet negotiating leader Vyacheslav Silanov on Friday [19 November] is whether Soviet fishing vessels will respect Norway's unilateral increase in net mesh size to 135 mm in the Spitsbergen fisheries protection zone. The size increase will come into force for the whole Norwegian zone 1 January, but the Soviet Union expressed reservations about the protection zone in 1977. The cod quota will be the same as this year — 340,000 tons -- the maximum recommended by marine researchers in order to maintain stocks of spawning fish. The Soviet Union had originally wanted a total quota of only 122,000 tons. The agreed on quota is to be split down the middle, but after the Soviets have transferred some of their quota to Norwegian fishermen, they may now fish 225,000 tons, around two-thirds of the total.

During the talks, the Soviet delegation was strongly critical of Norwegian overfishing using passive tackle, and it is clear that next year stricter statutory measures will be brought into operation. However, because it is difficult to regulate coastal fishing, Norway was unable to promise that no more cod than the quota would be caught. Both Silanov and his counterpart, Administrative Chief Gunnar Gundersen, said that they were satisfied with the agreement, as did Norwegian Fishermen's Federation Chairman Johan J. Toft. The agreement will also be of importance for next year's fisheries state support grant which will probably total less because Norway won a larger share of the total quota than the Norwegian Fishermen's Federation had expected.

The total capelin quota was increased from 1.7 million tons in 1982 to 2.3 million next year, divided 60 percent to Norway and 40 to the Soviet Union. Transfer of part of the Soviet quota will give Norway in all 65 percent of the total quota. Of this, 1.1 million tons can be fished this winter, the rest in the summer. Norway has won 71 percent of the haddock quota of 77,000 tons which with transfers amounts to 55,000 tons. Both countries are agreed that it is necessary that fish stocks in the Barents Sea — which as far as some species are concerned have fallen dangerously low -- be controlled and regulated. What the Soviet Union has gained in return, is blue whiting — a total of 485,000 tons, of which 285,000 tons can be fished around Jan Mayen and the rest in the Norwegian zone. The Russians will also be allowed to fish 70,000 tons of Norway haddock in the Norwegian zone and 5,500 tons of Greenland halibut of a total quota of 130,000 tons in the Norwegian zone.

EVIDENCE OF HARSFJARDEN SUBMARINE FOUND

[Unattributed report: "Finds After Submarine in Harsfjarden"]

[Excerpts] A foreign submarine has visited Harsfjarden. Certain finds have been made during the current seabed investigation and they have made the Armed Forces absolutely certain that it was a foreign submarine which was hunted in Harsfjarden in early October. According to reports received by DAGENS NYHETER, hull imprints, for example, have been found on the sea bed. "We have not found or raised any objects," Betril Lagerwall of the Defense Staff said, "but we have discovered certain traces of a foreign submarine. Otherwise we have no comment to make."

The discoveries which have been made are now being analyzed in detail by a special analysis group led by Commodore Emil Svensson. The analysis test results and the special tracks which have been found, will then be handed over to the political commission investigating the incident under the leadership of Defense Minister Sven Andersson. The commission is expected to publish its report on what really happened during the first two weeks of October in Harsfjarden and the Mysingen channel some time next spring.

[Text] The intercommunal talks continued at the Ledra Palace today with discussion of the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue.

Speaking before the meeting, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus Gobbi said it was decided to discuss the territorial aspect at the present stage although discussion of the constitutional aspect has not been completed. Answering relevant questions, Mr Gobbi said the territorial aspect will be faced as a whole and not as a specific matter. Asked whether the discussion would be formal, he replied in the negative but added this will depend on the manner in which the two sides would face the issue. With regard to what would be the basis of discussion, Mr Gobbi said both the UN secretary general's evaluation document and the two sides' proposals are at the negotiating table. These three elements, he said, guide the course of the talks.

Asked if the question of Famagusta constitutes part of the territorial aspect, Mr Gobbi said this is a special matter. Concerning the position of the two sides on the evaluation document in connection with the territorial aspect, Mr Gobbi said the time has come for the two sides to define their position on this matter.

Mr Mavrommatis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, stated that he did not think there was any problem for the discussion of the territorial aspect. He also said the discussion would not be formal but would concern the substance of the issue. Mr Mavrommatis said the proposals of the two sides will be the basis of the discussion. The discussion of the territorial aspect, he added, is not to be concluded at the present stage of the talks, which ends with next Thursday's meeting when the talks will recess and will resume at the beginning of December.

Asked if the decision by the Turkish Cypriot leadership to distribute the Greek Cypriot properties in the occupied areas and issue title deeds affects the dialogue, Mr Mavrommatis said any action that affects the talks in one way or another is properly raised at the negotiating table. Answering another question, the interlocutor reiterated that the question of Famagusta is of high priority and is always raised in the appropriate manner.

Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan stated that the question of the territorial aspect will be discussed from the beginning in order to establish where the talks can reach. Mr Onan said the way of discussing the territorial aspect has not been determined. The discussion, he added, will depend both on the proposals of the two sides and on the evaluation of the UN secretary general.

KHARAVYI DENIES REPORTS OF AKEL-DIKO PROBLEMS

[Text] The democratic alliance [the Democratic Party and AKEL] has described yesterday's concoction by I SIMERINI about alleged disagreements between the Democratic Party and AKEL on the issues of the talks and rapprochement as wishful thinking. A statement by the alliance stresses that the cooperation between the two parties is based on principles and continues unimpeded with sincerity, faith and enthusiasm. Because of this, it is receiving a growing response among the people, causing confusion and despondency in the ranks of the party of the extreme right.

The statement says the following: "The nearer the day of popular decision and verdict, 13 February 1983, approaches, the more their nerves are becoming tense and the coolness of the opponents of democratic alliance is evaporating.

In their agony they are forcing, one after another, lies and slanders against the alliance.

"Yesterday the newspaper of the 'necessary,' acting within this framework, published a lead story alleging disagreements between the Democratic Party and AKEL. In fact, it specifically referred to the issues of the talks and rapprochement.

"Such disagreements exist only in the dreams and wishful thinking- of the Democratic Rally and its leader. The cooperation between the Democratic Party and AKEL is based on principles with the interests of the people and of Cyprus as a yardstick and, having as a policy framework the two parties' joint minimum program, it is continuing unimpeded with sincerity, faith and enthusiasm. Both the issue of the talks and the issue of rapprochement, as well as all the other issues which concern the Cyprus problem, are lucidly clarified in the joint minimum program of the cooperating parties.

"The Democratic Rally knows this program very well. It knows well that it concerns a program for the salvation of Cyprus and our people's economic and social progress. It knows well that cooperation between the Democratic Party and AKEL is sincere and based on principles of cooperation which are receiving a constantly growing response among our people. Increasingly new forces of our people are embracing the democratic alliance. The Democratic Rally understands this, just as it also understands the certainty of its defeat at the presidential elections in February 1983.

"Like us, the Democratic Rally's members are sure that the outstanding, democratic, patriotic Cypriot people will triumphantly reelect as President of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou, the democratic alliance's candidate.

"The realization of these facts is apparently causing confusion and despondency among them."

DISTRIBUTION OF LAND TITLES IN NORTH DENOUNCED

NC241956 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] The government of the republic has stressed that the actions of the occupation regime for the distribution of Greek Cypriot properties in the occupied areas are unfounded and illegal and it will never recognize them.

With regard to an announcement by the Denktas regime that the distribution of final deeds for possession of Greek Cypriot properties will start, the government spokesman made a statement this evening stressing that the Cyprus Government in no way will recognize any fait accompli of the invasion and, consequently, the invaders and the Denktas regime are mistaken if they believe that, through their arbitrary actions, they create new realities, as they like to call them.

The spokesman stressed that the rights of the displaced Greek Cypriots to return to their homes and properties will not be separated or ever abandoned, and no decision by the occupation force or its subordinates can revoke these rights. The spokesman further said: These inalienable rights are recognized by repeated UN resolutions and, therefore, by all those countries which support these resolutions. The spokesman stressed: The announcement by the Turkish Cypriot leaders shows that they are unhesitatingly proceeding with a new arbitrary action that discloses their persistence to the policy of faits accomplish which they have been following since the Turkish invasion.

The government spokesman added that the Cyprus Government has denounced internationally this decision of the Turkish Cypriot leaders on this issue as soon as it was made and that President Kiprianou last July sent messages informing the UN secretary general and all heads of state of this arbitrary action and of other similar actions. In his messages, the president of the republic stressed that the illegal Turkish actions undermine the efforts for a Cyprus solution and are contrary to the UN resolutions and the summit agreements. The spokesman said that the response to the president's messages shows that the governments of various countries are not prepared to recognize the illegal acts of an occupation force and an illegal regime.

In conclusion, the government spokesman said that the Cyprus Government will proceed with a new denunciation and representations internationally so that pressure may be exerted on Ankara to abandon its inadmissible policy.

NATO AMBASSADORS BRIEFED ON TURKISH VIOLATIONS

NC242014 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] Deputy Foreign Minister Ioannis Kapsis this morning invited the ambassadors of NATO member states and briefed them on yesterday's violations of our national airspace by the Turkish Air Force. Kapsis showed the ambassadors a map of the area and indicated the points where violations occurred. As stated by the government spokesman, Kapsis also told the NATO member states ambassadors of the warning he addressed to the Turkish ambassador in Athens prior to the Turkish exercise about possible repercussions from violation of our airspace.

Kapsis also explained to the ambassadors that after these developments it was not possible to proceed with the meeting of Foreign Ministers Kharalambopoulos' and Turkmen in Brussels on 9 December.

A Turkish Foreign Ministry statement issued to the press includes the allegation that no violation of Greek airspace took place during the exercise.

The government spokesman said the government is waiting for the Turkish Government's official reply to yesterday's note which Kapsis handed to the Turkish ambassador in Athens before it reacts.

Reply to Turks' Statement

NC251938 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] The government spokesman made the following statement tonight: The Turkish Government today handed to the Greek ambassador in Ankara, Yeoryios Papoulias, its reply to the recent Greek protest. The Greek Government will reply through diplomatic channels.

In its reply, the Turkish Government alleges that no violations of Greek airspace occurred and that as a result it considers cancellation of the meeting of Foreign Ministers Kharalambopoulos and Turkmen, scheduled for 9 December in Brussels, as unjustified.

The truth, however, is that violations did occur in our airspace and certain of them were particularly provocative, culminating when three Turkish F-104 fighters overflew Psara Island, which is 45 miles from the area where the Turkish exercise was taking place.

These provocative violations are diametrically opposed to the moratorium, and despite the timely Greek Government warning to the Turkish ambassador, clearly prove that it is Turkey which strove for cancellation of the foreign ministers meeting. It is characteristic that the Turkish Government, in its reply, avoids any mention of the point of the Greek protest which stresses that if dialogue is to be conducted, the Greek Government believes it is essential to have a lengthy period of absolute abstention from any provocation, for which it is prepared to work believing in the peaceful coexistence of the two peoples; and it hopes that Turkey will contribute toward the creation of such conditions.

PAPER SAYS PASOK MAKING OFFICIALS 'SCAPEGOATS'

NC241732 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 24 Nov 82 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "The New 'Alibi'"]

[Text] It is obvious that the government is seeking a new "alibi" and new scapegoats in its effort to excuse its own inefficiency. Koutsoyiorgas gathered the directors general of the ministries and threatened them with dismissal if they fail to reactivate the state apparatus which is showing symptoms of paralysis.

It is not the secretaries general who are to blame, however, for our current mess, or, in any eventuality, they are not directly responsible for it. They were selected from among fanatical PASOK leading personalities and they took their positions with an excess zeal for work. Good intentions, however, are not enough. What is needed most of all and above all else is a correct policy and a correct direction. This is not the duty of the secretaries general. They simply implement the policy which others, above them, lay down. In other words, this is done by the party leadership and by the government. If today the state apparatus appears to be paralysed, this is because PASOK had only one program -- party control of the state. It neither had a program for "the first 100 days" nor a "batch of measures" for "immediate action." The result was that it turned the administration upside down. It rendered all the old and experienced officials useless. It appointed new and ignorant ones who had nothing to do with administration. It resorted to spur of the moment and arbitrary planning in order to deal with the country's problems. On no issue did it create the impression that it knew what it wanted and how to go after it. This is why Koutsoyiorgas' threats will change absolutely nothing nor will any possible replacements of secretaries general have any result; in the same way that the famous "restructuring" [of the government] had no effect.

AGRICULTURAL BANK CONVERSION ANNOUNCED 25 NOV

NC252101 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] A fundamental change in the financing of our farmers is undertaken by the incorporation of cooperative organizations in the Agricultural Bank. As announced today by Agriculture Minister Konstandinos Simitis, the government resolved to convert the Agricultural Bank from a state bank, which is its current status, into a state-cooperative bank.

This conversion will be undertaken through transfer of a portion of the bank's capital to the agricultural cooperatives. The regional organization of the agricultural bank will also be changed so that the cooperatives can have a more active involvement.

The government's aim, the minister added, is to make the Agricultural Bank's support to the cooperatives more effective and to strengthen farmers' participation in the distribution and processing of their produce.

FOREIGN MINISTRY ON VIOLATION OF GREEK AIRSPACE

TA241637 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has announced that the reason given by the Greek Government for cancelling the Turkish and Greek ministers' meeting scheduled to be held in Brussels on 9 December is totally unfounded. According to the Foreign Ministry statement, Greece has officially informed Turkey that it has cancelled the meeting scheduled between the foreign ministers of the two countries on 9 December. The Foreign Ministry statement said: As a reason for cancelling the meeting, the Greek Government has alleged that Turkey violated Greek airspace during the recent military exercise it held in the Aegean international airspace and international waters. This reason, which is based on a totally unfounded allegation, it not valid. The statement added that the Turkish military aircraft flew in the Aegean region in accordance with the provisions of the Chicago agreement and with those of the International Civil Aviation Assocation during the recent exercise as had been the case in all previous exercises.

The statement noted that Greece was informed on 3 November about the exercise, code named Koral-82, and about those exercise regions that extend into Athens FIR [Flight Information Region] area. The statement further added that the exercise was held in accordance with this information given to Greece and within international airspace. The decision concerning the meeting of the two foreign ministers to determine the method of the Turkish-Greece talks was made during the NATO meetings.

Memorandum on Views

[Text] Ankara, 25 Nov (AA) -- The Turkish Government has rejected the protest note of the Greek Government dated 23 November. Undersecretary of Foreign Affairs Ercument Yavuzalp has asked Greek Ambassador to Ankara Yeoryios Papoulias to his office to inform him of the fact and to hand him a memorandum containing the views of the Turkish Government.

According to a statement issued by the Foreign Ministry Friday [as received] Yavuzalp told the ambassador the allegation that Turkish military aircraft had violated Greek airspace were groundless, that it had [words indistinct] were flying in international airspace as defined in the Chicago convention under ICAO [International Civil Aviation Organization] rules.

As for the unilateral cancellation by Greece of the (?proposed) meeting between the foreign ministers of the two countries originally scheduled for 9 December in Brussels, the decision to cancel it has been based on "entirely groundless allegations." Cancelling the meeting clearly meant only a means for the Greek side to avoid a settlement of bilateral disputes through negotiations on various excuses, Undersecretary Yavuzalp said.

His government expects the Greek Government to come to realize the necessity for following a policy of restraint and deliberation from now on. A memorandum containing these points was given to the Greek ambassador during the interview, the Foreign Ministry statement said.

HUNGARIAN PREMIER LAZAR ENDS VISIT, DEPARTS

TA241839 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] Hungarian Premier Gyorgy Lazar has concluded his contacts and has left Turkey. The joint communique issued in connection with Lazar's visit to Turkey says that a unity of view has been reached concerning the balanced development and expansion of the economic and trade relations between the two countries within the framework of joint interests.

Lazar visited the Topkapi and Dolmabahce palaces in Istanbul this morning and wrote the following in the special box at the Dolmabahce Palace: Visiting this magnificent masterpiece of Turkish culture will be an unforgettable memory for me. Lazar later went on a motorboat tour on the Bosporus. He visited the municipal vehicles' maintenance and repair garage in Levent in the afternoon and was briefed on the condition of the (Icarus)-make municipal buses Turkey purchased from Hungary. Lazar referred to the importance of buses on public transportation and noted the importance of standarized vehicles from the viewpoint of spare parts and repair facilities. Of the 950 buses belonging to the Istanbul municipality, 450 are Hungarian-made.

Lazar left Turkey aboard a special plane at 1630. He was seen off with a ceremony by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at Yesilkoy Airport. Istanbul Governor Nevzat Ayaz, Istanbul Mayor Abdullah Tirtil and other officials were also present at the ceremony at the airport.

Ulusu said that Lazar's visit has greatly contributed to Turkish-Hungarian relations which in recent years have been developing within the framework of the principles of mutual respect, territorial integrity, sovereignty, noninterference in internal affairs and equality. Ulusu issued a written statement at Yesilkoy Airport after having seen Lazar off. He said that the two countries wish to further develop the successful co-operation they have achieved despite their different political and social systems. The statement added that the talks between the Turkish and Hungarian delegations have prepared the ground for the development of bilateral relations in accordance with mutual interests and that they have created the opportunity to better understand positions adopted on international issues. The statement also stressed that the atmosphere of friendship and understanding at the talks confirmed the fact that the developing relations will reach the highest level.

Ulusu then returned to Ankara.

The joint communique issued in connection with Lazar's visit said that the current situation in bilateral relations, possibilities for developing these relations and various international problems were discussed at the talks which were held in a sincere atmosphere. The communique added that the two countries were greatly satisfied with the development in Turkish-Hungarian relations in recent years and that they wished to further these relations in line with mutual interests. The communique further stressed the importance of high level contacts between the two countries.

Expressing great concern over the increasing international tension and the arms race, the communique called for all countries to exert effective efforts to insure international peace and security within the framework of the principles of noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries, national integrity and equality. According to the communique, Lazar invited Ulusu to officially visit Hungary. It has been announced that this invitation was accepted.

PAPER SAYS ULUSU MAY FORM NEW POLITICAL PARTY

NC260904 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 22 Nov 82 pp 1, 9

[By Yalcin Dogan]

[Excerpts] Ankara -- There has been much talk recently about a new political party to be named the "Center Party," and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu is linked to this party. The formation of a political party by the prime minister is becoming more "believable" with each passing day. In fact, although he has given ambiguous answers on this subject in the past, on his return from Moscow he answered a similar question as follows: "If the interests of the nation develop in that direction and I am convinced that I should undertake such a responsibility, I will take the initiative.

But I must first be convinced that such a duty is incumbent upon me." This statement by the prime minister acquires greater meaning considering that he accompanied President Kenan Evren on all the trips he made in the country in recent weeks. Behind the scenes in Ankara, it is speculated that it is a "possibility" Prime Minister Ulusu will form a new party. But this has raised another question: If Prime Minister Ulusu is going to form a new party, when is he going to resign?

In fact, this question was raised earlier. However, President Kenan Evren commented: "Even if you resign, it is you who will form the new government. Therefore, there is no need for you to resign. We would be wasting time." As a result of this statement, and to lend continuity to the state and prevent the disruption of services, Ulusu has decided to stay in office.

According to information from high-level officials, in the event that Prime Minister Ulusu decides to form a political party, he will be allowed to stay in office without having to resign.

MINISTER CITES PROTECTIONISM AT GATT MEETING

TA251812 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] State Minister Sermet Refik Pasin has said that since 1980 Turkey has been pursuing a more liberal economic policy, trying to cooperate more with the outside world, but that this policy had remained limited because of the protectionist measures implemented by some of the countries Turkey trades with. Speaking at the GATT meeting in Geneva, Pasin urged those countries to put aside these protectionist measures that divert international trade from its natural course. He added that such protectionist policies had increased during recent years. He stressed that it was very important to reconfirm the multilateral obligations envisaged by the GATT agreement to ensure that they were carried out.

Noting that expectations in the world economy were going the wrong way, Pasin stressed that, in order to solve economic problems, long-term policies must be pursued instead of short term and protectionist measures. He said: It is a contradiction that developed countries urge developing countries to pursue liberal economic policies while they themselves take protectionist measures endangering these policies.

Pasin also said that the world economy would be better off if the industrialized countries opened their markets more to the developing countries.

UN AMBASSADOR CRITICIZES AFGHAN INTERVENTION

AU261934 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 26 Nov 82 p 3

[Text] New York (APA) -- The continued military intervention in Afghanistan not only threatens the stability of the region, but also seriously affects the preservation of peace and security throughout the world. This was stressed by Austrian UN Ambassador Karl Fischer at the UN General Assembly. In his declaration, the Austrian representative referred to the fact that at the same time, this military intervention violates the principle according to which all UN members should refrain from the threat of or use of violence against the integrity or independence of any state.

100,000 TONS OF GRAIN SOLD TO SOVIET UNION

AU251622 Vienna KURIER in German 25 Nov 82 p 6

[Erwin J. Frazl report: "Orders Worth a Million for Our Farmers: Local Grain for the USSR"]

[Text] While the powerful U.S. farmers are pushing President Reagan to eliminate all obstacles to grain deliveries to the USSR, Austria's agriculture offers proof of its efficiency: Little Austria may place an export order worth millions with the Soviet Union.

Austria's agriculture has now also succeeded in entering the gigantic Russian market. During tenacious negotiations, director General Heinrich Lunacek (Raiffeisen) was able to achieve a contract to deliver 100,000 tons of grain to the USSR. The remarkable thing about the deal is that the Russians will pay cash, whereas thus far, domestic grain surpluses could only be sold with great effort through loans to Poland or to the GDR, which are also struggling with financial problems.

From January to March of the coming year, the Austrian grain deliveries will be shipped to the Soviet Union via the Danube. The agreed upon price per ton amounts to some $130 fob (freight on board of the transporting vessel) and thus roughly equals the price paid by the GDR for our grain.

However, this time payment will immediately follow. It thus appears that the first step into the huge Soviet market has been successfully taken. The negotiations with the Soviet Union were tough but particularly fair according to Director General Lunacek, who expects continuing business contacts with the Soviet Union in the future.

Since the financial means of the farmers (they are paying one-half of the amount which is necessary for bringing down grain prices to the world market level) have already been exhausted, negotiations on prefinancing these "sales contributions" are still in progress. The federation, which also supplies 50 percent of the subsidiary payments from state coffers, in any case is willing to make its contribution to the export deal. Lunacek: "Salcher [Austrian finance minister] has promised to pay. Thus, it might be possible to win a large-scale customer on a long-term basis."

In any case, the deal worth a million with the Soviet officials, with tremendous assistance from the embassy [not further identified] in Vienna, was marked by an excellent negotiating climate. Since, in addition, the Russians are well known as tough but reliable trade partners, the farmers -- provided the million's worth of transactions are carried off in a satisfactory manner -- are expecting appropriate followup orders.

INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS

[Unattributed report: "Indonesian Foreign Minister as Guest in Vienna"]

[Text] Indonesian Foreign Minister Dr Mokhtar Kusumaatmaja arrived in Vienna yesterday morning for an official visit. He was welcomed by Foreign Minister Dr Willibald Pahr at Schwechat Airport. Central to the 3-day visit is a working talk between Kusumaatmaja and Pahr concerning problems related to Kampuchea (Pahr is chairman of the Kampuchea conference). Talks on economic cooperation on a bilateral basis or in international bodies will also be conducted on the periphery of the visit.

The working talk with Foreign Minister Pahr has been scheduled for this morning. Before the talk, the Indonesian foreign minister will visit the Parliament building and attend a performance of the operatta, "Vienna Blood," at the Vienna People's Opera in the evening. On Friday, a visit to the Austrian president is on the agenda. At noon, Kusumaatmaja will open the new Indonesian Embassy building in Vietnna-Waehring and conduct talks with Chancellor Dr Bruno Kreisky in the afternoon.

In the evening, the Indonesian guest will attend a performance of Tosca at Vienna's State Opera.

IRANIAN PILOT, FAMILY REQUEST POLITICAL ASYLUM

[Unattributed report: "Iranian Pilot Applies for Asylum in Vienna"]

[Text] After an adventurous escape and a 5-day ride by horseback through snow-covered mountains of Kurdistan, Iranian pilot (Mahmud Namdar) (39 years of age), his 24-year old wife (Farsane) and their two sons aged 4 and 5 have finally arrived in Austria from Istanbul aboard an Austrian Airlines plane. As (Namdar) pointed out, he has already applied for political asylum in Austria.

Views Situation in Iran

[Text] At a press conference yesterday in Vienna, the Iranian pilot (Mahmud Namdar) who, as has been reported, fled from his country together with his wife and his two children and who now has asked for political asylum in Austria, provided a gloomy picture of the political, economic and human rights situation in Iran.

Over 80 percent of the factories in Iran are not operating and 5 million people are unemployed. The prices for food and other important consumer goods have increased 10 times since the Islamic revolution and can barely be paid. Iran does not stick to the OPEC standard price of $34 per barrel and sells its oil up to $8 per barrel under the OPEC level. From the revenues of the oil sale, weapons, some from Israel, are purchased for the war with Iraq.

Due to the resistance of broad circles of the population, the regime already has come under considerable pressure, but tried to cover up the problems with the Iraqi war. (Namdar) also charged the Khomeyni regime with grave human rights violations. In the country, the wave of executions and detainments of opposition members and members of minorities is continuing.

INCREASED PARLIAMENTARY CONTACTS WITH USSR

LD261822 Hamburg DPA in German 1033 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Nov (DPA) -- Parliamentary contacts between the FRG and the Soviet Union are to be increased. Helmut Schaefer (FDP), chairman of the German-Soviet parliamentary group in the Bundestag, announced on Friday that both sides have agreed to exchange parliamentary groups after a break of several years. It is thought that in the first half of 1983, a delegation of the Supreme Soviet will come to Bonn. A return visit by a Bundestag delegation is then planned.

In his capacity as the foreign policy spokesman of the FDP parliamentary group, Schaefer will embark this Saturday on a 4-day visit to Leningrad and Moscow. He will meet with leading experts on Germany and the West in the Soviet Government and the CPSU Central Committee and, he says, hopes to learn more about Soviet foreign and security policy since the change of leadership in the Kremlin.

SPD'S VOGEL VIEWS INTRA-GERMANY RELATIONS

LD262012 Hamburg DPA in German 1511 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn/Munich, 26 Nov (DPA) -- According to SPD chancellor candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel, there is no special path for the two German states which leads out of the East and West military blocs and into neutrality. Tonight, during a lecture to the political club of the Evangelical Academy at Tutzing, Vogel said that both German states should aim at moderation -- each within its own alliance -- both in conflicts and in avoiding and reducing tensions.

The SPD politician also spoke in favor of continuing in exchange between the two German states, "the policy of taking little steps instead of uttering grandiose words." He advised increasing personal contacts between people in both parts of Germany and increasing talks at the political level.

As specific aims of intra-German policy, Vogel mentioned rescinding the increase in the minimum exchange levy for visitors to the GDR and increasing efforts to solve efforts to solve joint evironmental problems. The electrification of the rail connection between Berlin and the FRG and an arrangement concerning the urban railway in West Berlin -- which is under GDR control -- are other possible subjects of negotiation. Finally, an economic framework agreement between both states could be in their mutual interest.

Vogel strongly rejected GDR demands for upgrading the permanent missions in Bonn and East Berlin to the rank of embassies and for recognition of GDR citizenship. On this last point, there could, at best, be clarifications of present FRG practice and its correctness, but no changes. This does not violate GDR rights.

Jenninger on GDR Relations

LD281345 Hamburg DPA in German 1201 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Nov (DPA) -- According to the minister of state in the chancellor's office, Philipp Jenninger (CDU) reducing the minimum exchange levy remains a basic condition for successful talks with the GDR on questions that go beyond the basic treaty. In an interview with the HANDELSBLATT newspaper, (Monday edition) to mark his planned visit to East Berlin on Thursday, Jenninger was answering a question on the electrification of railways between the FRG and Berlin.

Jenninger mentioned a series of concrete negotiations in connection with his planned talks with top GDR politicians. He also said that a cultural agreement was being prepared by both sides. Bonn was also planning negotiations on the cleaning and desalination of the Werra and Weser Rivers as a condition for a comprehensive environmental protection agreement with the GDR.

Jenninger was pleased with the positive development of intra-German trade, which has increased by 10 to 12 percent. Despite the economic recession, this trade will be further developed.

PLO'S AL-IFRANJI URGES FRG MIDEAST INVOLVEMENT

LD261026 Hamburg DPA in German 0952 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Nov (DPA) -- 'Abdallah al-Ifranji, the PLO representative in Bonn and Vienna, has called upon the FRG and the other EEC states to once again play an active role in the Middle East.

Al-Ifranji said on Thursday evening at a reception to commemorate the "international day of solidarity with the Palestinian people" that since the change of government in bonn, European policy on the Middle East is in danger of arriving in a blind alley. The Arabs now have no partners in Europe," the PLO representative said. He pointed to German-Arab relations, which had been good up to now, and the political influence of Bonn within the EEC.

Al-Ifranji regretted that new Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl has announced his intention to visit Israel with the situation as it presently is. "At the very least, this indicates ignoring what the Israelis are doing in Lebanon and does not contribute to the efforts to find a solution in the Middle East," he said. Al-Ifranji said that Europe's restraint in the Middle East aids the United States, which has always been against a European-Arab rapprochement.

AFGHAN AIRLINE PILOT REQUESTS POLITICAL ASYLUM

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 28 Nov (DPA) -- An Afghan plane with 152 passengers on board was unable to leave the Frankfurt Rhein-Main Airport on Sunday evening because the 42-year-old pilot requested political asylum. Late in the evening it was still unclear whether the copilot and the flight engineer had also requested political asylum in the FRG.

A spokesman of the Flughafen AG said during the evening that the DC-10 with flight number FG 702 would not leave for Kabul before Monday afternoon. The passengers are still in the airport building. After receiving permission for takeoff, the pilot and possibly the other crew members declared their intention to remain in the FRG.

CDU/CSU, SPD REJECT COALITION AFTER 6 MARCH

LD281120 Hamburg DPA in German 1151 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Text] Hamburg, 28 Nov (DPA) -- During the weekend, Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl and SPD candidate for the chancellorship Hans-Jochen Vogel rejected a grand coalition between the CDU/CSU and the SDP after the conclusion of new elections which are planned for March. When he spoke on Sunday in an interview on Deutschlandfunk radio, Kohl said he does not believe there is a danger of the Federal Republic becoming ungovernable. Referring to statements made by CSU chief Franz-Josef Strauss to this effect, Vogel told DPA on Sunday in Munich that a grand coalition could be justified only in an emergency, which he does not believe applies.

YOUNG DEMOCRATS CUT TIES WITH FDP AT CONFERENCE

LD271238 Hamburg DPA in German 1154 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Text] Bochum, 27 Nov (DPA) -- The German Young Democrats (DJD) have now officially separated from the FDP, the youth wing of which they represented for 35 years. An extraordinary national delegate conference of the Young Democrats in Bochum decided on Saturday, with only a few abstentions, to change the DJD constitution accordingly.

The discussion at the conference of about 85 delegates made it clear that the Young Democrats now wish to incorporate themselves as the youth wing into a new left-liberal party that is to be established Sunday in Bochum.

Form New Party

LD281358 Hamburg DPA in German 1335 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Text] Bochum, 28 Nov (DPA) -- On Sunday, the federal congress of leftwing liberals in Bochum voted by an overwhelming majority to found a new liberal party. Of the approximately 1,500 participants, who included numerous former FDP members and Young Democrats, only about 30 voted against such a party. In a second vote on who would take part in this party, over 1,400 voted in favor.

Before the decision was made, there was an almost 4 hour debate that mainly dealt with the question whether or not the new party would take part in the new Bundestag elections.

POLL SHOWS DECLINE IN GOVERNMENT APPROVAL RATING

NC271744 Paris AFP in English 1656 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 27 (AFP) -- A majority of the French disapprove of the 18-month-old Socialist government of President Francois Mitterrand and Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy, according to a poll published today by the weekly magazine LE POINT.

Of 1,045 voting-age French questioned between November 15 and 19, 49 percent thought the government's performance was "rather bad" or "very bad," while 38 percent expressed more favorable views.

Fifty-two percent had a negative opinion of Mr Mauroy's performance, while 33 percent had a positive opinion.

Forty-nine percent thought France's economic situation would worsen, while 24 percent were optimistic about an improvement.

Fifty percent thought purchasing power would drop, against eight percent to the contrary.

Forty-two percent agreed with the statement, "The leftist government does not have the capacity to take command of the problems currently facing France." Forty percent disagreed with the statement.

The disapproval did not, however, benefit the opposition in the public eyes. Former President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, former Prime Minister Raymond Barre and Paris Major Jacques Chirac received greater negative than positive ratings.

LE MONDE WEIGHS REAGAN, ANDROPOV 22 NOV SPEECHES

[Editorial: "Caution and Hope"]

[Text] The two speeches which Mr Andropov and Mr Reagan almost simultaneously delivered on Monday, 22 November, could not have come at a better time to mark the start of the new dialogue which Leonid Brezhnev's death will make possible between the two superpowers. It is still a veiled and very indirect dialogue since each is officially behaving as if nothing has changed: The U.S. President completely ignored the change of team which has just taken place in Moscow and Mr Andropov did not even name the "imperialist" power whose enterprises he condemned -- although without excess.

The most striking thing is the limitation which political and social inertia imposes on the leaders' intentions in each of the big capitals. Mr Reagan was addressing the Pentagon, which was awaiting its new MX missile, just as was public opinion, whose fears over the prospects of nuclear war he said he understands. Similarly, Mr Andropov strove to reassure both his military -- whom it is "vital" to equip with "everything necessary" -- and his consumers who were promised new reforms. There is reason to wonder whether by dint of trying to satisfy everybody at once, the good intentions are not likely to remain a dead letter once again.

However, some "more attractive" signals will be noted. As regards the U.S. side, Mr Reagan's decision to construct the new MX intercontinental missile probably looks like a very unpleasant "wedding gift" to his new partner. But that program, which had already been widely discussed in the United States for at least 5 years, is not new and it can be argued that, after all, the President is limiting it "for the time being" to 100 missiles, in other words, half the number envisaged by his predecessor.

In addition, Mr Reagan adopted a new tone in welcoming the Soviets' "serious attitude" at the Geneva negotiations and is accompanying his decision on the MX missiles by new offers on "confidence-building measures" likely to reduce the risks of nuclear war. Although it is doubtful that the Kremlin will agree to exchange the large-scale strategic intelligence which Washington, in keeping with a long-standing position, is requesting, Mr Andropov might be more receptive to the proposal to modernise the "red teletype" and to notify of missile tests: After all, the general staffs in both camps have to face the same problem of "unidentified objects" appearing on their screens.

As regards the Soviet side, Mr Andropov is warning that he will not make any unilateral concession or any concession "prior" to the resumption of dialogue, but the tone he is adopting toward Washington is markedly less virulent than Leonid Brezhnev's last speech on 27 October. His silence on Afghanistan and on the problem of the U.S. Euromissiles in Europe does not justify any optimistic conclusion at this stage, but it may reflect a desire to keep those matters in abeyance for a new examination.

It is also worth noting the insistence with which the new secretary general is asserting that the arms race is not an "option" chosen by the USSR, and that Moscow has never viewed military force as "a solution to everything." No doubt Brezhnev never said the reverse but, after a reign marked by an unprecedented strengthening in that sphere, such protestations were perhaps not futile nor fortuitous.

LE MONDE VIEWS REAGAN VISIT TO LATIN AMERICA

[Editorial: "Mr Reagan's Trip to Central America"]

[Text] The White House created some surprise on Saturday, 20 November, by announcing that Mr Reagan would stop off in Honduras during his visit to Latin America, which is due to take place from 29 November through 4 December. Only three stops had been scheduled: Colombia, where Belisario Betancur, the new conservative president, is making praiseworthy efforts to end creeping armed insurrection; Brazil, where the elections on 15 November are going to make it possible for many leftwing leaders to return to political life; and Costa Rica, one of the few real democracies in the Western Hemisphere, threatened by economic collapse and the dangers of war in Central America.

By deciding to stop off in Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras increasingly "involved" in the region's conflicts, Mr Reagan is, of course, reviving speculation on Washington's policy in Central America at a time when the increase in military tensions (in El Salvador and along the border between Nicaragua and Honduras) is accompanied by new pressure in favor of political and negotiated solutions.

In Tegucigalpa, Mr Reagan will meet with Honduran President Suazo Cordova, and Guatemalan President Gen Rios Montt, whose army is pursuing a merciless repression of the rural population, which is suspected of aiding a civilian and military extreme right which dreams of regaining control.

He hopes that a possible restoration of U.S. military aid will consolidate his government and strengthen the struggle against the guerrilla movements. It is difficult to give Gen Rios Montt's Guatemala the label "democracy," on however modest a scale, something Mr Reagan would like to encourage in this region.

For their part, the Honduran leaders welcome this tribute paid by the United States to their regime, which is certainly democratic since the civilian president has been regularly elected, but also fragile because General Alvarez, the commander in chief of the Army, is publicly showing his preference for increased military cooperation between Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala -- three countries which, according to him, are engaged in a fight to the death against communist subversion in Central America.

Nicaragua's Sandinist leaders think that Mr Reagan's top-level talks in the region are a "provocation" and "support for the aggressive plans" of the neighboring countries. The Sandinist leaders, who are aware of the limits of Soviet aid, are determined to hold political negotiations with their neighbors, especially with Honduras' leaders. Honduran Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Paz Barnica's recent visit to Managua seemed to pave the way for a top-level meeting between the Honduran and Nicaraguan leaders.

That hypothesis has just been ruled out by Mr Paz Barnica, who thinks that Mr Reagan's visit strengthens his country's "democratic position." The Salvadoran situation will also be discussed in Costa Rica, as in Honduras. It is El Salvador whose extreme right-wing victory in the 28 March elections is increasingly embarrassing the United States, which is concerned by the repeated human rights violations in that key Central American country.

ROVING ENVOY TO LATIN AMERICA INTERVIEWED

PM251603 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 22 Nov 82 p 6

[Interview with Antonine Blanca, French roving ambassador to Latin America, by Feliciano Fidalgo in Paris; date not specified]

[Text] Question: What is the significance of your appointment as roving ambassador to Latin America?

Answer: It is the first time that France has made such a decision. And it did so precisely for this particular area of the world. What I mean is that it will not necessarily appoint roving ambassadors to other continents or regions. Hitherto, Latin America has not played the leading role that it should have in French politics. And this is what we are trying to remedy.

Question: How can this new initiative by the French Government be defined?

Answer: We want to show that our policy in Latin America is not just a policy of the defense of human rights. It is very important to establish and to intensify relations with a region where diverse situations are known to exist, which will in any case be decisive for the future. We want to prove from the outset that the problems of Latin America are not confined to the East-West dispute but are problems for the countries of Western culture. In short, France is willing to act as an interlocutor, not only as it intends to be for the other Third World countries, but with the additional dimension of our shared culture.

Question: How do you envisage a future intersection of Spanish and French actions in that region?

Answer: We must jointly work with the new Spanish Government. The Spanish Socialist Workers Party has precise ideas about its task in Latin America, and this is natural.

There must be consultations among the socialist governments of Europe, but above all, there will be French-Spanish consultations, though each country will defend its own interests. Be that as it may, my appointment was designed not to complicate matters but rather, to simplify them. And the fact that I am a friend of Felipe Gonzalez and Alfonso Guerra eliminates problems.

Question: Do you believe that whether or not Spain is an EEC member could in any way facilitiate its action in Latin America, or the contrary?

Answer: This is a matter entirely for Spain, in my opinion. However, I do not believe that membership or otherwise in the EEC will affect Spain's policy with respect to Latin America. Italy's case proves this. Be that as it may, you will understand that France, for example, will not abandon its opportunities in Latin America out of love for Spain.

Question: Do you believe that Spain could replace the Common Market with intensive cooperation with Latin America?

Answer: No, I do not believe so.

Question: The French Socialist government has begun cooperation with Nicaragua. Moreover, it signed the French-Mexican joint communqiue in favor of El Salvador. Then came the Malvinas conflict and Paris supported Britain, contrary even to the stance of a leftwing government such as Cuba's. What lessons do these experiences represent for you?

Answer: At first we regarded the Nicaraguan revolution as being basically just. On the other hand, France knows that it cannot influence the Latin American continent on its own and therefore seeks cooperation with the region's most important countries such as Mexico. And as far as the Malvinas conflict is concerned, it is true that we may have failed to understand, but they too must understand.

PCF PAPER CITES MARCHAIS-CUNHAL PRESS CONFERENCE

[Jean George report: "Elements of Detente in the International Situation"]

[Text] At the end of the meeting between the PCP and PCF delegations, [PCP Secretary General] Alvaro Cunhal and [PCF Secretary General] Georges Marchais gave a press conference at PCF headquarters yesterday. They were accompanied by PCF Politburo member Francette Lazard, PCP Central Committee member Albano Nunes and [PCF] Central Committee secretary and Politburo member Maxime Gremetz who chaired it. After reading the joint communique, the latter invited the journalists to immeditately ask their questions.

The first question was address to Alvaro Cunhal, who was asked what he thought of the suggestion that "the Western communist parties are having some difficulty in keeping up."

"The situation is different in the various countries," he replied. "We think that there are a fair number of communist parties which have recently been making major progress. We certainly do not share the idea that the communist parties are being weakened. The situation varies, sometimes there is progress, sometimes setbacks, but in general we note an increase in strength."

Jacqueline Dubois (French Television Channel 1) then questioned Georges Marchais on the development of the international situation. At present you are the best informed politician in the world," she said. "You have met with the Chinese number one. You met with Mr Yuriy Andropov in Moscow. Do you think that a tide of appeasement is rising in the world?" Another journalist then raised the same question.

Georges Marchais specified that "that list can be extended" and that he also met with Indira Gandhi, Fidel Castro and Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau at Leonid Brezhnev's funeral.

Picking out the conclusions which he drew from the many conversations he had, he added: "I think that there are now elements of detente in the international situation. For a while, we witnessed a kind of escalation in the stances adopted which constituted elements of tension. Today I will not conceal the fact that I personally am extremely optimistic."

Four Elements of Detente

The PCF secretary general then cited the four elements which lead him to that conclusion.

The first relates to peace and disarmament. "All the delegations present in Moscow, all the messages sent to pay tribute to the Soviet head of state for his peace policy," he stressed, before noting that, through Yuriy Andropov "the Soviet Union has reaffirmed its desire to have discussions and make progress towards peace and disarmament," and that "many governments, heads of state and party chiefs expressed the same view." [sentence as published] On that basis, Georges Marchais noted, conditions exist for discussion to be started and for progress to be made toward disarmament.

He then picked out a second element: "The flagrant failure of Reagan's policy aimed at boycotting economic cooperation with the USSR." To back up that idea, he cited the example of the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline and the presence in Moscow of 250 American industrialists to discuss the development of economic cooperation between the two countries with the Soviets. "I also know," he added, "that the Soviet Union wants to actively develop its cooperation with France." Another element is also tipping the scales in the direction of cooperation: "The capitalist countries are experiencing a deep crisis and they need this economic cooperation with the socialist countries." There are, therefore, conditions for making progress in that connection too, Georges Marchais stressed.

Afghanistan

The third element is: "I note that in some parts of the world where tension still reigns, there are possibilities of moving toward political settlements."

Georges Marchais cited the case of Afghanistan: "In Moscow I learned that the Pakistani president seeks a political settlement. Afghan President Babrak Karmal said that he wanted discussions to be opened with a view to finding a solution. The Soviet Union stated that if there was a political settlement, it would immediately withdraw its troops. I conclude, therefore, that the Afghan problem ought to be settled fairly quickly."

Georges Marchais also referred to the situation in Poland: "I am extremely satisfied, "he said, "to see that Lech Walesa has been released, that he himself has announced the need for and possibility of discussion among the various components of Polish society to find a way out of the crisis. That too is an important factor in international detente. I welcome that, primarily for the Polish people themselves. I see it as confirmation that the position we adopted on 13 December last year was right -- that every effort must be made to avert civil war. Of course, there are far-reaching reforms which must be made in Polish society at the economic, social and democratic levels, especially in connection with the trade union problem.

But given that the idea of confrontation has been rejected and discussion begun, I regard this situation as an extremely favorable element."

Finally, the fourth element is the problems between the USSR and China. Georges Marchais stated that he is "resolutely opposed to the idea that there are superpowers," but, he added, these are states, one of which has more than 1 billion inhabitants and the other 280 million. "When I observe," he continued, "that although relations between those two countries has hitherto not been good, the latest positions show a considerable change and a development toward the restoration of new relations, and that is an element which must be taken into account in the development of the international situation and which makes me optimistic."

Reagan Is Not Getting His Own Way

Alvaro Cunhal then gave his opinion on these same questions. "The change of general secretary is not an event which could bring about a change of policy. Moreover, in his first speech after Brezhnev's death, Andropov confirmed the CPSU's line.

"As regards detente, the fact that the Reagan administration has not succeeded in obtaining all the results it had hoped for is a very positive fact. It has obtained some of them, which are defeats for the peoples' struggle for liberation and independence. But the growing movement against that aggressive policy, the resistance which the U.S. Administration is encountering among its allies provide real opportunities for detente."

With regard to Lech Walesa's release, Alvaro Cunhal stated: "It is an internal matter. I will neither express my joy or the opposite to you. It is a decision which the Polish authorities made in view of their country's situation -- a decision which we respect. But it is not for me to show my feelings about it."

Freedoms

Georges Marchais was then asked whether Yuriy Andropov had given him to understand that he was going "to make a gesture in the sphere of freedom."

"We did not discuss that question during the meeting we had," the PCF secretary general stressed. "As you know, the Committee for the Defense of Freedom and Human Rights, of which I am chairman, pursues an active policy on that question toward all the countries concerned. I recently had the opportunity to inform the press of the answer I had been given regarding Shcharanskiy. I was assured that there was no need for anxiety about his health -- that was what I was told on the Soviet side. But I was also told that the things for which he was reproached do not favor a gesture at the present time. I repeat: that is what I was told on the Soviet side."

Franco-Soviet Relations

Still talking of his meeting with Yuriy Andropov, Georges Marchais stated: "I raised the question of France's interests. Those interests are the development of political, economic, scientific and cultural cooperation with the Soviet Union on the basis of mutual interest. We are not posing that question in terms of reversing alliances. Moreover, in the past there was extremely active cooperation in the framework of our alliances."

Georges Marchais underlined the Soviet desire, expressed to him in Moscow, "to resume normal cooperation and to develop it. The vast possibilities for cooperation were greatly stressed," he added.

"I gathered from the remarks made by the president of the republic, the premier and the external relations minister that France intended to adopt that course and I welcome this. Any initiative in that direction will be supported by the PCF."

One journalist expressed concern at the fact that Pierre Mauroy was received by Nikolay Tikhonov and not by Yuriy Andropov.

"People are indulging in speculation," Georges Marchais replied. "Pierre Mauroy is premier; in Moscow he met with Tikhonov, who is premier. Claude Cheysson, who is external relations minister, was received by Gromyko, his counterpart. As for me, I am PCF secretary general and I met with the CPSU general secretary. That is all extremely simple."

The Elections in Spain

Alvaro Cunhal and Georges Marchais were questioned in turn on the Spanish election results.

The former stated: "The reactionaries have been removed from power. We think that that is a very positive result. We hope that the fascists are not strong enough to attempt a military coup. As regards the PCE's results, we think that they provide grounds for very serious consideration. Our comrades will study the causes of those results."

While welcoming the right's defeat, Georges Marchais recalled that the French Communists "felt the fraternal Spanish party's setback as a severe blow because that party, like the PCP, made enormous sacrifices in the struggle against fascism."

The Common Market's Expansion

The European assembly is in favor of Spain and Portugal joining the Common Market. Georges Marchais was questioned on that. First he recalled the PCF's constant opposition to that expansion "for reasons which primarily stem from French interests." The PCF's objective is not to leave the EEC, but to change it "so that it is no longer a tool serving monopolies and multinational firms." The entry of Spain and Portugal would merely aggravate the situation by creating "extremely daunting" competition, given the lower living standards of workers in those countries. "We are speaking from experience. We have been in this Community for a long time. The workers and peasants were promised a great deal. I do not think that would make it possible to solve the Spanish and Portuguese workers' problems."

Alvaro Cunhal shares that opinion from the viewpoint of Portuguese interests. Joining the EEC would be disastrous for his country, whose economy is backward and whose productivity is still low. The PCP secretary general also stressed that the reactionary forces now in government in Lisbon want to take advantage of EEC entry to align Portuguese institutions with those of the FRG, Belgium, or the Netherlands, thus finding "a pretext for destroying the democratic gains which emerged from the 14 April revolution."

A question on the criticisms which President Eanes has leveled at the Portuguese Government gave Alvaro Cunhal the opportunity to paint a picture of Portugal's political situation after the revision of the Constitution and on the eve of the municipal elections on 12 December.

The Situation in Portugal

The present government, he explained, is only in government thanks to a "temporary situation." It does not have a majority in the country.

Its policy is leading Portugal to "the brink of disaster." Its aim is to "restore monopolist capital, which was destroyed by the revolution." That is why, "with the cooperation of the Socialist Party leadership," it liquidated the Council of the Revolution and transferred its military powers to the defense minister. Nonetheless, the president still has the power to dismiss the government and dissolve the assembly.

Early parliamentary elections would enable the people to have a representation in keeping with actual opinion. That is why the PCP is calling for such elections. He noted the criticism leveled by General Eanes at Mr Balsemao's government. He noted, as a "positive fact," that the latter confirmed on television that he intended to use his powers if necessary. Dissolution should have been carried out earlier, but it is still not too late to avert a rightwing coup d'etat; nevertheless, the situation is very serious.

The forthcoming municipal elections will therefore play a national role. "We think that our party and those with us in the 'United People's Alliance' will increase their total number of votes and will increase their majority in the municipalities they control."

With regard to the results of those elections, Alvaro Cunhal said that the right might very well lose votes and keep or even increase the number of municipalities it controls. That is due to the alliances and the electoral law. What will count, therefore, at the national level is the percentage of votes and the upward or downward trend.

Although forecasts are "always difficult," the PCP secretary general recalled that his party obtained 16 percent of the votes in the last elections. "We could further increase," he added.

At the end of this press conference, Alvaro Cunhal again stressed the popular struggles in his country.

"Portuguese democracy is passing through serious dangers," he concluded. "We cannot know what the situation in Portugal will be in a few months' time. The battle between the reactionary forces and our people is very close. We communists are concerned, but we have confidence in our people and in the strength of democracy in Portugal."

BULGARIAN ARRESTED FOR ATTEMPT ON POPE'S LIFE

AU251959 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, November 25 -- The 35-year-old Bulgarian national, Ivanov Antonov, arrested this morning by Rome anti-terrorist police will be formally charged withmaterially participating in the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II on May 13 last year in Saint Peter's Square, a police spokesman said in the afternoon.

The arrest of Antonov, an employee of the Bulgarian Airlines office here, went a long way towards substantiating the theory that the assassination attempt sprang from an international plot, police said.

Self-styled Turkish terrorist Ali' Agca, who was captured at the scene of the shooting and is now serving a life sentence here following conviction on the charge, maintained that he acted alone but investigators pursued a trail which had led to the arrest of alleged accomplices in Switzerland and West Germany.

The press office of the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome, contacted in the afternoon, said, "We learned of the news on the radio. We do not know the precise charges (against Antonov) so, for now, we can make no comment". The spokesman said that as of 1600 GMT, the embassy had not been informed of the arrest.

In February, a 29-year-old Turk identified as Oemer Ay was arrested in Hamburg on the request of Italian police. He is said to be a member of the "Idealist Association of Workers" affiliated with an extreme rightist party.

Another Turkish National, Omar Bagci, a butcher by trade, was arrested in Switzerland in connection with the case and extradited to Italy. He is reportedly a member of the extreme rightist "Grey Wolves" organization.

Last month, a man identified as Musa Cedar Celibi, the president of the Federation for the Promotion of Turkish Culture Abroad, was arrested in West Germany and has since been questioned by Italian magistrates.

Bulgarian Embassy Protest

AU260948 Rome ANSA in English 0858 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Excerpts] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 26 -- The Bulgarian Embassy here has protested the innocence of 35-year-old Sergei Ivanov Antonov, the tourist office employee arrested by Italian police Thursday on charges of being materially involved in the attempt on Pope John Paul II's life in May last year.

Speaking with newsmen Thursday evening, an embassy spokesman said the embassy is "convinced" of Antonov's innocence of the charges. The statement also voiced the hope that the Italian authorities will "assess the case justly and objectively and free the Bulgarian citizen who has been unjustly detained."

In its statement, the embassy cited Bulgaria's international activity for peace and cooperation with Italy and other countries as supporting testimony to the East European country's rejection of national and international terrorism as "extraneous to the interests of peace, international security, and cooperation".

"Any attempt to blame this monstrous phenomenon of international life on Socialist Bulgaria and to link its name to it is absurd and without foundation", the statement asserted.

According to the Italian police, they got on to Antonov's trail by following numerous clues. They include Agca's contacts after his flight from the Kartal Maltepe jail near Istanbul in November 1979.

Between then and April 1981, he spent time in West Germany, Switzerland and Italy, having contacts with numerous fellow countrymen whose position in the papal shooting is now being assessed.

Despite the lack of official confirmation, there have been insistent rumors in recent days that Antonov was arrested when Agca decided to exploit Italy's recent law allowing plea-bargaining for repentant terrorists in return for a reduction in their sentences to finger the Bulgarian.

But authoritative sources say the Bulgarian was not recognized through photographs taken in St Peter's Square at the time of the attack.

It is known that investigators have been following Antonov for months and, in what may be an indication that he had sensed something was up, his wife and child recently left Rome, although it is not known whether they returned to Bulgaria.

Official Bulgarian Role Denied

NC271404 Paris AFP in English 1343 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Text] Rome, Nov 27 (AFP) -- The magistrate investigating last year's assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II today dismissed press allegations that Bulgaria or its secret services were responsible. The statement came in a communique released today two days after the arrest here of a Bulgarian tourism official in connection with the May 13, 1981, attack on the Pope.

Judge Ilario Martella said that accusations directed against a "foreign power or persons not directly under investigation" were for the moment "completely unfounded."

The arrest Thursday of Sergei Ivanov Antonov, Balkan Airways' deputy director in Rome, had rekindled press speculation here that Bulgarian intelligence services acting for the Soviet KGB had been behind the assassination attempt because of the pope's relation to Poland's free union Solidarity.

In his communique, Mr Martella acknowledged it was possible that Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turkish terrorist convicted of shooting the pope and currently serving a life term for the crime, acted in the "framework of a criminal plot" in association with "several other persons" some of whom had not been identified. It was the first time officials had referred to a "plot," a hypothesis which had been raised at the time of Agca's trial but could not then be proved. Judge Martella said his investigation had not been completed and that other persons might later be incriminated.

Since his arrest Thursday, Mr Antonov, 32, has been interrogated several times in his cell at Rome's Rebibbia Prison. He has repeatedly denied any involvement in the attempt, repeating: "This is absurd, I know nothing." Sources close to the investigation, however, said there is "crushing evidence" against him.

They said investigators believe he was a "pawn" in a plot to kill the pope and was in St. Peter's Square at the moment of the shooting when he was to have helped the gunman escape while a third accomplice fired shots in the air to create a panic.

Press reports here today said investigators may have been put onto Mr Antonov's trail by Agca himself. They said the gunman was cooperating with Italian law in a bid for amnesty.

[illegible] tigation

AU290834 Rome ANSA in English 082 [illegible] 32

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 29 -- [illegible] garian connection in investigation of the assassination attempt against Pope Joh[illegible] II appears to be gaining ground with reports arriving here from Turk[illegible]y that two more Bulgarian nationals may have been active accomplices in [?the shooting] in St. Peter's Square last year.

The reports indicated that Bulgarian Diplomat (Teodor Aivazov) and (Sotil Kolev) were part of what could be revealed as an international conspiracy to kill Pope John Paul II. On Thursday Rome police arrested Bulgarian national Sergei Ivanov Antonov, station chief of the Bulgarian national airlines in Rome, on charges of "active complicity" in the attempt on the pontiff's life.

According to the reports, (Sotil Kolev) was in St. Peter's Square when Turk Mehmet Ali Agca fired two shots, seriously wounding the pope. Agca was apprehended minutes later. He was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. Agca has always denied he had any accomplices. Police in Rome, however, claimed no knowledge of (Aivazov) and (Kolev). Nevertheless, it has been learned that the magistrate investigating the shooting, Ilario Martella, will soon go to Turkey again for further inquiries.

The latest development in the investigation are believed to be the result of revlations made by Turk Musa Cedar Celebi, the president of the Federation for the Promotion of Turkish Culture Abroad, who is currently in jail in West Germany waiting for extradition to Italy. Celebi, arrested on an international warrant on charges of planning the assassination attempt, was questioned by Martella two weeks ago in Frankfurt.

The other Turks involved in the investigations are Omar Bagci (extradited last week to Italy from Switzerland) who is suspected of having supplied Agca with the gun 1 week before the shooting, and Oral Celik and Bechir Selenik, for whom international arrest warrants have been issued.

Selenik is suspected of having supplied Agca with three million German marks to pay for the year-long trip through numerous European capitals that finally led him to Rome. Celik is suspected of having originally obtained the gun used in the shooting.

FANFANI CONTINUES TALKS TO FORM GOVERNMENT

AU261004 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 26 -- The Italian Government crisis seems to have reached a turning-point as political sources said today that Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani, the Christian Democrat Senate speaker, appears to wind up his government-formation negotiations Saturday.

Fanfani yesterday won a "constructive availability" to his government platform from his proposed government majority of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and Republicans. He will be meeting them again tomorrow.

The major points in Fanfani's platform are institutional reform, the fight to clean up public life in Italy, new measures against terrorism, narcotics, and organized crime, a strengthening of Italy's international role, and the battle against inflation and the economic recession.

On this last and most crucial point, Fanfani has proposed radical changes in wage indexation, a wage truce for two years, a special once-and-for-all tax to rake in almost 4.7 billion dollars, a ceiling on pensions, and increases in public tariffs. Yesterday, Fanfani and the five parties achieved "full consensus" on everything but economic policy, where they agreed on objectives, but asked a committee of experts to discuss the details of the measures today.

The politicians apparently most optimistic on a rapid solution of the crisis are Christian Democrat Secretary Ciriaco de Mita and his Liberal counterpart Valerio Zanone. The other parties seemed less optimistic that the crisis can be solved by Saturday evening, as Zanone suggested.

In another plus for Fanfani, the Italian industrialists' association, Confindustria, described Fanfani's proposals as "clear, articulated, well-argued, and credible."

Unions Threaten Strike

AU271438 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 27 -- Italy's three major federated trade unions have threatened to call a general strike if the radical platform drafted by Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani is officially adopted by the new government he is trying to form.

Fanfani has proposed radical changes in wage indexation, a wage truce for two years, a special once-and-for-all tax to rake in almost 4.7 billion dollars, a ceilings on pensions and increases in public tariffs.

The general secretaries of the CGIL, CISL, and UIL Trade Unions met here Friday and agreed a general strike will be called if the platform goes through. In a statement after the meeting, the labor leaders said Fanfani's program "is essentially centered on a unilateral stance which harms workers and pensioners, while it does not grapple with intolerable positions of privilege and income and does not contain steps in favor of employment and against recession."

GROUPS START MARCH AGAINST CRUISE MISSILE BASE

[Excerpts] (ANSA) -- Milan, November 27 -- A peace march to protest the installations of cruise missiles at a base near the Sicilian town of Comiso set here today with plans to cover the 1,500-kilometer walk to the missile site by Christmas. Five thousand were on hand in Milan's Piazza Duomo to start the march. They were carrying rainbow-colored banners and banners with a white dove on a blue ground to demand peace and disarmament.

Next Wednesday, President Sandro Pertini will receive the leaders of the Comiso Peace and Disarmament Committee at the Quirinale presidential residence and, during next week, a delegation of pacifists will be meeting with various parliamentary caucuses to argue against the installation of the new missiles approved by the Rome Parliament last year.

PRIME MINISTER'S 26 NOV SPEECH ON 1983 BUDGET

LD270354 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2030 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Speech by Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao delivered in connection with the presentation of the 1983 budget on 26 November in Lisbon -- live or recorded]

[Excerpts] The general state budget and the major options of the plan for 1983 were presented today by the government in the Assembly of the Republic and submitted to the National Council of the Plan. Many people may think that these are just another two documents to be discussed and voted on by the members of Parliament, but this is not so. The major options of the plan lay down the targets to be fulfilled next year with regard to economic and financial policy -- investments, income, prices. The government is responsible for setting these targets as well as creating the conditions that will make it possible to achieve them. However, these targets affect us all, both because they will affect our everyday lives and because the ability to achieve them does not depend on the government alone, but also on the degree of commitment given by every citizen, every employer, every worker, every organ of sovereignty.

The budget, for its part, is an essential instrument for the action of the state insofar as it lays down public expenditures and revenues, sets the taxes that we must pay and regulates the management of the human resources that depend on the central government, that is to say, the public servants. It is through the budget that the citizens and the political, social and economic forces can guage the earnestness of the government's intentions and its concrete capacity to act in these difficult times that Portugal and the world are going through.

These are indeed not easy times. A year ago, when we talked of an international economic crisis, we were accused of looking for excuses for the difficulties confronting our country. Now we stand accused by some of not speaking enough of the international economic crisis. Both charges are false, for we have always kept the nation informed of the internal and external problems of our economy and both charges reflect a wrong state of mind. We cannot conceal the truth and pretend that all is well, nor can we give in to moods of catastrophic alarmism that can only complicate matters.

The truth is that there is a generalized crisis affecting all world countries, both West and East, oil producers and nonproducers alike. It is also true that all governments -- be they communist or conservative, socialist or Christian Democrat, Social Democrat or liberal -- are taking steps to fight the crisis. Also true, moreover, is that Portugal is not immune to this world crisis and that the Portuguese Government has been taking the steps deemed adequate for confronting it, while at the same time creating the conditions for bringing about the political changes indispensable for tackling our problems.

Despite the attempts to stage a general strike and the opposition we met from various quarters, we have been able to revise the Constitution, pass the national defense law and set the constitutional tribunal in operation. We are now closer to Europe, and to Africa too.

The construction of the democratic state of law is an essential aspect of the stability desired by all Portuguese women and men, a stability without which -- and regardless of the color of the government -- nothing can be achieved in our country.

This task of building the democratic state is never completed and must be reflected in all our attitudes. In this connection, I would mention the tragedy of Camarate [December 1980 air crash] which caused the deaths of seven people, including Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro [then prime minister] and Adelino Amaro da Costa [then defense minister].

I wish to make it clear that the investigations are continuing and will be pursued to the very end through the public inquiry ordered by the attorney general of the republic. I further wish to make it clear that the government has been making available -- and will so continue to do so -- all the means necessary for ascertaining the truth, including the recourse to national and foreign experts designated by the authorities, by private individuals and also by RTP [Portuguese television, which is completing an investigative documentary]. I also wish to declare that all those in possession of information which they deem useful to the investigation can and should contact the judiciary police. I also wish to point out that, precisely because we must build a democratic state of law, we must respect the law of the land and the principle of the separation of powers according to which it obviously does not behoove the government nor any of its ministers to conduct the investigations.

No one can accuse me of seeking to draw political dividends from the Camarate affair. For this reason, I believe I have the right to declare that the tragedy that caused the deaths of Sa Carneiro and Amaro da Costa is too big a tragedy to be exploited by anyone, and to guarantee that the investigations will continue for as long as necessary and regardless of whom they may inconvenience.

It is thus a matter of building the democratic state with all its components. One of the latter, as I have been saying for the last 2 years, is economic recovery and financial regeneration. In this regard too, the government assumes its responsibilities. It would have been easier, on the eve of an election campaign, to be demagogic and find an excuse for delaying the presentation of the budget and of the major options for 1983 until after the 12 December [local elections], but we reject the thesis of the easy way out.

The budget is aimed, first and foremost, at setting the state on a sound financial footing. Once again the deficit will not exceed 150 million contos. This is still an excessive amount, of course. It represents, however, remarkable progress, bearing in mind that the 1983 deficit will be the same as that for 1982, which in turn equalled that for 1981. Taking inflation into account, the fact that we have managed to limit the deficit to 150 millions for 3 years running means -- as it had already meant in 1982 in relation to 1981 -- a 20 percent reduction in real terms.

To achieve these results it has been necessary to cut the various ministries' current expenditures, forcing each minister to manage his department in an even more efficient manner. With regard to state investments, however, the overall amount will be maintained so as to ensure the completion of work in progress and make it possible, within necessarily low limits, to start further work. The selectivity imposed on investments by the adoption of these criteria will cause delays -- or a more prudent staggering -- in some projects.

With regard to taxation, some supplementary taxes will be introduced, namely additional tax brackets as well as updating of the existing ones. In this connection, it was sought to achieve a fair distribution of sacrifices by sparing from the main burden those in the employ of others and the workers with less industrial clout. Thus, for example, an embarkation tax will be introduced to be incurred by everyone -- foreigners and Portuguese alike -- leaving the country by air.

One of the main problems is our foreign debt, and its reduction might contribute to slowing down the rise in prices. The estimated inflation rate for this year -- December through December -- is expected not to exceed 20 percent; taking into account the positive deceleration of the last 6 months, we are aiming at 18 percent by the end of 1983 assuming, obviously, that the dollar will not continue to rise since that currency has decisive weight on our imports -- namely oil and [word indistinct] products.

Wage increases must be the object of self-restraint. Contrary to the claims of certain social and political forces which refuse to acknowledge the gravity of the situation and have as their main goal the destruction of the democratic state of law, the government will not be imposing any kind of ceiling on wage increases. However, the government recommends that wage increases should not exceeed 17 percent and insists that when this percentage is exceeded, those involved -- the employers and workers -- must contribute with 30 percent of the additional increase to the unemployment fund, or, alternatively, devote the 30 percent to savings in the form of government bonds or [words indistinct] bonds.

In conjunction with the general state budget and the major options for 1983, the government will be sending a set of measures to the Assembly of the Republic aimed at changing the economic and social structures of our country. Among them -- and not wishing to impose too much upon your time -- I would highlight the boundaries law and certain steps in the agricultural sphere.

The boundaries law -- on the demarcation between the public and private sectors -- will allow the access of private enterprise the areas of economic activity from which it is presently barred, thus putting an end to the excessive burden of the bureaucratic running of the nationalized part of the economy, tightening the discipline imposed by competition and correcting the abuses of power by the monopolies, even -- and perhaps above all -- in the case of state monopolies.

With regard to labor legislation, we are seeking, and shall continue to seek, the broadest possible consensus among the two sides of industry. We shall not desist, however, from the fundamental goal of creating conditions conducive to the setting up of new enterprises and the creation of new jobs, bearing in mind that the present system affords excessive protection to some employees to the detriment of many would-be workers -- some employed as casual laborers and others still seeking their first job.

There are bound to be people advocating harsher measures, basing their stand on the harshness of the international crisis itself. This is not our policy. An accumulation of bankruptcies and mounting unemployment would add fresh problems to those already confronting us. We do not wish to impose excessive sacrifices, but we shall not shirk the necessary ones. We are convinced that the adoption of this policy, one of lucid stringency but not blind austerity, will entail the acknowledgement of two fundamental aspects. On the one hand, the awareness that the problem confronts all the Portuguese, not the government alone; understanding and acceptance are needed; it is necessary to work harder to produce more and distribute better; it is necessary that the other organs of sovereignty and the social and economic forces should realize what is at stake and make a joint effort -- on a national level -- so that we may achieve the success we deserve as the independent country that we are and wish to remain; and, on the other hand, the growing assertion of the authority of the state. With regard to this, I shall give only two quick examples: The right to strike is the workers' inalienable right, but the abuse of this right -- in the shape of boycotts, acts of sabotage and so on -- is condemnable and must be punished. The pressing of legitimate demands in the workplaces is acceptable and advisable, but their imposition by illegal means like the forcible locking-in of the management, is condemnable and must be punished. Which we did, in fact, at the Siderurgia Nacional and shall do again whenever necessary.

Such is the policy we feel dutybound to pursue on behalf of those who voted for the Democratic Alliance in two successive elections. Against us we have had -- and will likely continue to have -- the extremists, the visionaries, the feeble and also the divisionists. However, we have won all the battles with which they have confronted us. We won over the attempted general and transport strikes, we won over the marches of the unemployed, we won over the essential issue of the revision of the Constitution. The parliamentary -- as indeed the social -- majority has remained united and cohesive. The opposition has gained no credibility nor strength. We have had greater political stability than nearly all the other European countries. In conclusion, I would say that all this has a specific meaning: The Portuguese people understand the difficulties and maintain their confidence in the Democratic Alliance and its government.

We know that there will be difficult times ahead, but we also know that it is not by running away from the problems, and much less by looking for new and supposedly original solutions, or by returning to old failed solutions that we shall resolve our problems. In the same way that excessive optimism can be harmful, morbid pessimism can also have a paralyzing effect. With realism and good sense -- two of the basic qualities that have given us 8 centuries of history -- we shall be able to travel the path already mapped out. The government answers for this path, as will all those people -- in the final analysis, all the Portuguese -- all those people who will have to travel it.

AIR FORCE CHIEF CALLS FOR CONFIDENCE IN REGIME

PM241625 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 19 Nov 82 p 10

[Cover-LA VANGUARDIA report: "Lt Gen Emilio Garcia-Conde: 'We Must Not Appear To Be the Armed Forces of a Primitive Country'"]

[Text] Madrid -- Air Force chief of staff and spokesman for the Joint Chiefs of Staff Lt Gen Emilio Garcia-Conde has sent Air Force members a clearly democratic message following the general elections. In his message Lt Gen Garcia-Conde criticizes putschists, rejects the debates about the dichotomy between civilian and military power, defends the established system and encourages his troops to view the future confidently.

The message, published today by the weekly TIEMPO, is unprecedented in recent history and was drafted and issued shortly after the 28 October elections, when the PSOE's victory was already known. Its substance, the magazine adds, is based on remarks made to him by King Juan Carlos about the present situation.

Briefly, Garcia-Conde says that "the situation must be regarded with the utmost calmness and confidence, in the belief that we will succeed with our hard work and determination." He adds that "it is necessary that the Air Force, an integral part of the Armed Forces, observe the greatest unity, giving an example of tranquillity, authority and respect for the laws that govern the nation's activities."

He also says that "we must ensure that all Spaniards regard us with admiration and respect, confident that security and peace depend on us." To this end "it is necessary to prevent other citizens, assessing us with an erroneous concept of generalization, from regarding us as responsible for permanent unrest, as possible perpetrators of violent coups that could cause deaths, imprisonments, bloodshed -- in short, an imposition by force over the will of others." In this connection, the Air Force chief of staff says that "we must not give the impression of being the Armed Forces of a primitive and backward country unable to live in peace and freedom without being in a state of constant unrest because of the possibility of the violent and illegal acts of an unacceptable minority trying to impose its will on that of the majority of its fellow countrymen. And what is even more intolerable, using to that end the weapons and means that the entire nation places in its hands for the defense of shared interests, which these small regressive groups have neither the ability to define nor the exclusive right to preserve."

"Let us analyze the real nature of patriotism," he says, "and let us deliberate sensibly and with lofty aims. Let the Armed Forces not seek glory in triumphing over their brothers at the cost of bloodshed."

Garcia-Conde continues by stating that united, we can emerge from the difficulties, "but must do so in a civilized and legitimate manner, with respect for other people's freedom." He believes that the circumstances that brought us to a war must not recur and urges us not to give the world the image of an immature country, "of Armed Forces motivated by senseless, ambitious or demented groups which could unwittingly lead us to grave and insoluble situations."

The message is dated 29 October 1982.

CARRILLO'S RESIGNATION SPEECH REPORTED

PM251443 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 12-18 Nov 82 pp 18-20

[Unattributed report on outgoing PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo's report to 6-7 November PCE Central Committee meeting in Madrid: "Santiago Carrillo's Resignation an Example of Responsibility"]

[Text] In presenting the Executive Committee's report to the Central Committee -- a report that included his irrevocable resignation as secretary general -- Santiago Carrillo briefly reviewed the characteristics of the political situation, the discussion of which the Central Committee based on the document published on the previous pages. [See 26 November Western Europe DAILY REPORT page N5] We will therefore summarize the first part of his speech, in which, having described the present situation as one of doubt and despondency within the party, he stressed the reinvigoration of democracy implied by the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's [PSOE's] victory and the large election turnout, as well as the collapse of the political representatives of putschism. He pointed to the danger of the spectacular rise by the "hardline" right now represented by the Popular Alliance and the convergnce in the tactic of polarization between the right and the PSOE.

He explained that the PSOE's victory was possible because that party acted as a catalyst to the working class, the reformist bourgeoisie and middle classes -- but by means of a pact not with the middle classes but with big businessmen, providing a guarantee not to carry out structural social and economic reforms. At the same time, he said, this moderation did not deprive the PSOE of the workers' vote, the majority of the 1979 Communist vote and part of the vote of the extraparliamentary left.

To demonstrate this, he explained how the forces that have dominated in the process of political reform in Spain have been the forces of the right, and within them, the reformist sectors having reviewed the different political stages that have inevitably influenced our tactics. He pointed out how the putschist threat helped to keep alive the fear of the radical changes that we Communists may have represented, which led the PSOE to be considered the suitable instrument for change in Spain today. "In my opinion," he said, "the issue of the Communist Party being the instrument for change this time does not even arise, because this would have meant the PCE having to change or to merge with the PSOE."

He recalled how throughout the election campaign the Communists' chances were jeopardized by the various rumors and real threats of a coup and by the desire that the Popular Alliance should not win, which were present in the PCE's own election campaign. He analyzed how the welcome given by the ruling sectors to the PSOE's rightward shift, reflected in its crisis and its special congress, contrasted with the stubborn campaign conducted against the PCE.

He pointed out how internal causes obviously also contributed to the election results, indicating that for some time the leadership has been paralyzed by a constant state of crisis.

He stressed the need to support the PSOE government in all measures involving change, both in the Congress of Deputies and within society, not yielding to the bitterness of defeat or to the attraction of a major Social Democratic Party."

"From the party's viewpoint, it must recover -- not only its lost influence, but a complete recovery of the PCE as a whole, with a Eurocommunist strategy. A party open to all and which appeals particularly to those who have left it and are willing to again accept its policy and organizational principles. We have a grassroots, the party's incredibly worthy and unselfish membership, who have mobilized in this campaign with an enthusiasm which seemed impossible following the crisis." He also said that the PCE's 850,000 votes are an ideological vote, the majority of which come from men and women who could hold party membership cards. "It is obvious," he continued, "that the party's results oblige us to make changes and efforts of regeneration in the right direction, but we have agreed in our dicsussion that these changes must be carried out calmly and prudently, not under the impact of the feelings of defeat, and moreover proceeding from the fact that the party's recovery can be achieved neither by a spectacular gesture nor by an extraordinary change that will secure for us overnight the influence we had before and more, but only by a change toward a task in which patience must be used, because it will require time, intelligence, determination and tenacity.

"This is why our proposal contains no suggestion of an extraordinary party congress, and at the Executive Committee meeting we were unanimous in presenting things as we have shown them here. For we believe that the start of a process for an extraordinary congress within the party would provide an opportunity not for an objective, calm and tranquil debate, but for a revival of all the crises that have occurred within the party, under even worse conditions, which would cause us to touch bottom, and for a struggle -- not to save the party but to see who will gain the party leadership. We all agreed this would be a mistake. We pronounced ourselves in favor of a debate, starting from this Central Committee meeting, of course -- a debate in which the Central Committee must be involved, but with a view to a national conference. This does not rule out the possibility, under different conditions, of considering bringing the regular party congress, the 11th, forward by some months.

"We decided that these matters must be broached without hysteria; that calm and tranquil changes must be made to the style, methods and composition of the central leadership and of the other leaderships, calmly and with a unitary will, but enabling the party to be the PCE that will provide a place for all communists, whatever their beliefs, if they accept its program and rules.

"And we decided to express our desire -- and we believe that the Central Committee should do the same -- to remain united in this adverse situation, so that, giving absolute priority to the party's recovery, we can give an example to all our members, who have in some cases, moreover, already given such examples to us -- their leaders -- in the past few days.

"And we believe that the change must be brought about by a process of promotion and removal in all the party's leadership structures, starting at the top, calmly and quietly -- we are talking about a space of 6 months -- in the belief that it is not with hysteria and haste that we will extricate the party from the pit. In that way, all we could do is finally split it and destroy it."

At Center of Political Storm

"At present, at this meeting, we propose only one change, a change of secretary general of the party Central Committee. I would like to explain why I have submitted my irrevocable resignation from the post of secretary general, and will end my speech on this point. I have been at the center of the storm, the hurricane, for all these years as party leader. I have suffered as a result of being party leader. Anyone else would have experienced the same as I have. I have been at the center of all attacks on the party, and even of attacks within the party. This is because in the various issues and the various internal crises, I have had to perform the role of being answerable in both cases. I am not saying that others have not been answerable, or anything of the kind. But because of my position, I have been the one who has become most directly involved.

"At this time of crisis caused by the prior situation and by the defeat, I decided that if I withdraw from the secretary generalship, we would free the debate within the party of an impassioned and often irrational pro- or anti-Santiago element. We will be better able to approach the debate in the way in which it should be approached: For or against a Communist Party with a Eurocommunist strategy. I believe that this is the context within which we must now place the debate in our party -- not the context of support for versus opposition to Santiago, not the context of whatever 'unknowns' ['tapados] there may be, who are also possible candidates for the secretary generalship.

"If we all strive to ensure that the debate is situated within this context, that it takes place within this context of support for versus opposition to the party and support for versus opposition to Eurocommunism, I believe that we will have created more favorable conditions for a solution of the crisis. This is why I presented my resignation in an irrevocable form to the Executive Committee and am now repeating it here and now to the Central Committee. This is not the first time, but the second, so the second time is lucky. I presented it before because I did not feel able to lead the party in the approaching election battle, since there were serious confrontations and conflicts within the party leadership itself. I know that many comrades considered it a maneuver on my part; who believe that I was taking this step to return to the surface with more authority. No comrades, I was serious when I submitted my resignation and I am serious now about going home.

"On the last night of the Central Committee meeting, I withdrew my resignation following pressure from the comrades of the Executive Committee, who promised me their full and complete sharing of responsibility for whatever might happen in the general elections. I withdrew it and I told some of them so, knowing that it would be the end of me. Why? Because I was convinced that our election results would be bad, though not as bad as they have been, and that I was primarily to blame. Do you know why else I withdrew it? Because I have never liked evading political dangers, and I knew that this was a serious political danger.

"I have never concerned myself with preserving or protecting my image as party leader. Perhaps it is a defect, but I have always felt a great unconcern for this aspect, for my image. Because of the same sense of responsibility that made me withdraw my resignation before, I now say that, at this very difficult time for the party, I am not going home to write, though I will take this opportunity to write; I am not going home to write, as I had previously planned. I will remain in the party leadership, in the Central Committee or Executive Committee, if you agree. I will continue working with the group or select group of communist deputies, which will now need to multiply to play even a minimally valid role in Parliament. And I will remain to help even a minimally valid role in Parliament. And I will remain to help whatever new secretary general you appoint at this meeting, helping him ensure that the party proceeds with its strategy.

"When some comrades said to me: 'There will be many comrades in the party who have fought for Eurocommunism and who fought for you who will feel abandoned,' I told them, and I say now, that they must not feel abandoned, because though I am resigning, I am not buried; I am resigning, not disappearing. And I will continue actively to stimulate and support everyone who wants a party such as the one that we have collectively been advocating in this leadership and in previous party leaderships.

"I repeat that, out of a sense of responsibility, I will continue working if the Central Committee agrees.

"And that is all, comrades. The Executive Committee is examining a proposal for the post of secretary general. Irresponsibly, the news of my resignation was disclosed together with this name -- one of several that we considered, but one on which we do not yet have a final decision because we are awaiting his reply. This was irresponsible, which means that we have much ground to cover to create a sense of responsibility among the top party leaders. The Executive Committee will put forward this name later during this session. I believe that we must now center our attention -- I mean at this point in the debate -- on the policy document and on the change being made, and on the desire and proposals for change that we are expressing, and that we should examine the issue of the new secretary general when the time comes during the course of this meeting. And that is all, comrades. As I have said, there will be a recess so that you can finish reading the document and formulate your opinions, after which we will continue the session."

DANISH, NORWEGIAN SOCIAL DEMOCRATS TO VISIT 'ARAFAT

[Text] Copenhagen, Nov 26 (AFP) -- Delegations of prominent Danish and Norweign Social Democrats will travel to Tunis on November 30 to hold political talks with Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) leader Yasir 'Arafat, it was announced here today. The former foreign ministers of Denmark and Norway -- Kjeld Olesen and Knut Frydenlund -- will head their respective delegations during the five-day visit.

The meeting with Mr 'Arafat is to hear the PLO's views for a solution to the Middle East crisis. Mr Olesen said, "We believe that no Middle East solution can be carried out without PLO participation. Therefore, it is important to hear what the PLO has to say," he said. "At the same time, we will tell the PLO that Israel has the right to exist in security behind its own borders," he added.

U.S. NEEDS TO TEST 'SIGNALS FROM MOSCOW'

PM241549 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 19 Nov 82 p 4

[Rafael Paro editorial: "Now It Is Important To Listen"]

[Text] The power handover in Moscow has awakened hopes in the world that it will now be possible to open many of the deadlocks in the international situation. The change at the Kremlin summit also means that certain pieces of the puzzle which have been hanging in the air are beginning to fall into place in international politics. However, on many counts we still have every reason to ask ourselves what was planned policy and what was mere accident in what happened on the world stage before and after Leonid Brezhnev's death.

Perhaps the most important impression the world has had of Yuriy Andropov is that he is ready to start work, to become an active participant. Today it is possible to begin to suspect that Moscow was in possession of several options for its policies toward the West, East and the South, but that Leonid Brezhnev's health and the imminent power handover contributed to a certain passivity.

Perhaps the most important example is Chinese-Soviet relations. Talks at the diplomatic level began as long as 6 weeks ago between the Soviet Union and China in Beijing after being suspended ever since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979. At the reception in Moscow on Monday, the Soviet hosts with Andropov at their head attracted great attention by showing great interest in their Chinese guests. When Foreign Minister Huang Hua returned to Beijing on Thursday he said that China takes an "optimistic" view of the prospects that consulations on improved relations will have some results.

In the West there have been discussions of whether it perhaps would not be right to give the new Soviet leader a "wedding present" in the form, for example, of a year's postponement of the deployment of the new medium-range missiles in Western Europe. It seems as if the Chinese had something of the sort in mind. The question is whether Brezhnev's heir does not see Beijing's preparedness to discuss improved relations as a wedding present which is not to be despised. The Chinese gesture has its very special significance in the light, for example, of the Soviet Union's standing in the Third World as a result of Afghanistan and developments in Kampuchea.

For most observers it also came as a surprise that Pakistan's strong man, Gen Ziaul Haq, also went to Moscow and that PRAVDA reported that Andropov discussed "the situation in Afghanistan" with him. The Indian-Pakistani rapprochement has, it would seem, borne some fruit and Islamabad, which has problems with the Afghan refugees, has probably been making soundings in Moscow for a considerable time.

The release of Lech Walesa probably cannot be connected directly with Brezhnev's death. But the funeral diplomacy in Moscow did, however, give rise to an interesting new piece of Polish news. At a reception at the Greek Embassy Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski told Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou (who had relatively recent experience of army rule) that martial law will be lifted by 15 January at the latest. The general added that he intends to stick to the timetable no matter what happens.

U.S. President Ronald Reagan did not travel to Moscow. Instead he sent his vice president, George Bush, and Secretary of State George Shultz. Britain showed the most restrained approach of all the Western powers -- Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher did not even sign the book of condolences at the Soviet Embassy in London "for reasons of principle."

However, President Reagan's actions last Friday and Saturday are interesting in one respect. He announced that the U.S. embargo on the Soviet gas pipeline to Europe has been lifted. Was this a positive gesture to the Soviet Union, a concession or just a woolly compromise to avoid a troublesome disagreement with U.S. allies in Western Europe? The fact is that President Reagan did not renounce what he had not already lost. As far as is known he has long been trying to find a way out which could give him an opportunity to lift the sanctions without losing face. The new formula for economic ostpolitik was almost -- but not quite -- fully negotiated with the Europeans when the news of Brezhnev's death arrived. Reagan made his announcement, but in his haste gave it a shape which galled the French.

It is unclear what the Europeans have agreed to instead of the gas pipeline embargo. The Reagan administration has been keen to bring about credit restrictions against the Soviet Union and limit the export of high-technology equipment. When President Reagan announced on Saturday that "an agreement has been reached between the United States and its European allies on the terms for trade between the West and Eastern bloc" the French external relations minister published a communique a few hours later: "France was not party to the agreement announced in Washington this afternoon." Was this France's "wedding present" for Andropov -- a present which Reagan was made to pay for? At any rate it looks as if President Reagan "took a tumble" last weekend. Or, to use another metaphor: The ball rolled over to the Kremlin and Andropov showed himself to be a fullfledged player.

We must hope that the U.S. leadership is sufficiently aware to hear the new signals coming from Moscow. In particular it is important to test the theory which says that the election of Yuriy Andropov as party chief indicates a Soviet desire to reduce tension in relations both with the United States and China, since there are so many problems on the domestic front waiting for a solution.

GOVERNMENT ABSTAINS ON UN NUCLEAR FREEZE VOTE

[Jens J Krogh report: "Government Turnabout at the Eleventh Hour"]

[Excerpt] The nonsocialist government probably saved its life when it yesterday decided that Denmark should abstain in the proposed UN resolution calling for a nuclear arsenal freeze.

"We will vote as we think fit, and we will adhere to our view and vote against the resolution like our NATO partners," Danish Prime Minister Poul Schlueter said in London on Monday evening during a break in his talks with Margaret Thatcher.

Eighteen hours later -- yesterday afternoon -- the government had changed its prime minister's decision, and yesterday evening Denmark abstained on the Swedish-Mexican proposed UN resolution calling for a freeze on all the world's nuclear arsenals. "Let the matter be raised in the Folketing. We will resign if we are defeated in a non-confidence vote," Poul Schlueter said on Monday evening.

But things did not need to go that far. The government supported the majority line on the issue. As late as yesterday morning, Social Democratic Chairman Anker Jorgensen wrote an open letter to Poul Schlueter reminding him of the advice the government had received from the Folketing Foreign Affairs Committee on Monday. Anker Jorgensen also wrote: "We must assume that the government will follow the view expressed by the majority... in the event of a different approach by the government, the Social Democratic Party will take steps for an emergency debate which would determine whether the government enjoys the people's confidence on this matter."

The matter will probably not be raised in the Folketing now. The parties behind the majority vote by the Folketing Foreign Affairs Committee (the Social Democrats, the Socialist People's Party, the Liberals and the Left Socialist Party) have announced their satisfaction with the government's decision to follow the wishes of the majority.

There was much drama surrounding the vote right to the last minute. As late as an hour and a half before the UN vote was to take place, Denmark's UN mission in New York said that it had orders to vote against the Swedish-Mexican proposal. The orders were only changed at the last minute. Acting Prime and Foreign Minister Henning Christophersen said after the political turnabout that the government had taken the parliamentary situation into consideration. "We really wanted to vote against the resolution, but respect the fact that there is a clear majority for an abstention in the Foreign Affairs Committee," Henning Christophersen said.

BODSTROM GETS 'COLD-SHOULDER' ON ZONE OVERTURES

[Ulf Andenaes report: "Norway Gave Bodstrom the Cold Shoulder"]

[Text] Sweden's new foreign minister, Lennart Bodstrom, was given the cold shoulder by the Norweigan Government when he tried to put new life into the idea of a Nordic nuclear-freeze zone during his visit to Oslo on Friday [19 November]. It had been announced in advance that this was one of the main reasons for Bodstrom's visit to Norway. His political talks with Prime Minister Kare Willoch and Foreign Minister Svenn Stray, however, have made it clear that the Palme government's attempts to revitalize the plans for a nuclear-free zone are not considered interesting by the Oslo government. Afterwards, Bodstrom was forced to admit to the press that the talks had not helped toward strengthening the basis for such a zone.

"I am not a missionary," Bodstrom said when asked what he and his government intend doing now. "But it is not even possible in Norway to avoid the discussion of the nuclear-free zone, and in Sweden we will continue to work for it on the basis of broad support on the part of public opinion and a majority in the Riksdag," the foreign minister said.

It is already clear that the Danish Government is distinctly cool toward the idea of such a zone and Bodstrom's visit to Norway has therefore come as confirmation that in practice the issue has been killed stone dead for a long time to come. Bodstrom's talks with Prime Minister Willoch dealt with economic as well as security questions. The Norwegians pointed out that through its record devaluation, Sweden has exported its unemployment to Norway. He defended Swedish policy by claiming that the measure was necessary in order to counter international currency speculators. As far as relations with Europe were concerned, Bodstrom stated that Sweden's nonalignment is today the only reason why the country remains outside the EEC. He said that it was a "peculiar difference" between the two Scandinavian neighbors that the reason which kept NATO member Norway out of the EEC was of no importance to Sweden, while the considerations which kept Sweden out of the EEC did not exist in Norway. Bodstrom's visit to Norway is a leg of his Nordic tour, since within the space of this month Olof Palme's new foreign minister will visit all the Nordic countries.

PARTIES SPLIT ON 'NO' TO UN NUCLEAR FREEZE

[Terje Svabo report: "Norwegian 'No' at United Nations Yesterday"]

[Excerpt] "Voting for the Mexican-Swedish proposal for a freeze on nuclear arsenals at their present level would conflict with the strategy for the negotiations in Geneva. The objective of these talks is not a freeze but a sizeable reduction in the numbers of nuclear arms," Norwegian Foreign Minister Svenn Stray said after yesterday's meeting of the full Storting Foreign Affairs Committee. At the meeting, the Labor Party made it clear that the party had wanted the government to abstain in the UN vote yesterday evening Norwegian time. After yesterday's meeting [Party Chairman] Gro Harlem Brundtland said that she found the basis for such an abstention in the Labor Party manifesto. According to reports received by AFTENPOSTEN the Conservative, Center and Christian People's Parties supported the government's decision on the vote, while the Labor Party, the Liberals and the Socialist Left Party wanted the government to abstain.

A freeze on nuclear arsenals at the present time would mean the maintenance of the imbalance in Europe where the Soviet Union has supremacy in such weapons. It is therefore doubtful whether it is possible to square a freeze with the NATO 1979 dual decision. Yesterday's meeting of the full Foreign Affairs Committee also means that there is a split between the Conservative and Labor parties on yet another security policy question.

REAGAN, ANDROPOV SIGNALS DO NOT HERALD THAW

[Editorial: "Armed Dialogue"]

[Text] Since President Brezhnev's death several messages, both written and spoken, have been exchanged between Moscow and Washington. Both superpowers have given the impression of wanting peace, mutual understanding and disarmament.

Speculations that these messages are signalling a thaw in East-West relations deserve no attention, however. A deep-frozen status quo still prevails, confirmed by two speeches on Monday [22 November], one in Moscow and one in Washington.

In Moscow new Soviet leader Andropov spoke to the CPSU Central Committee. He did not depart one inch from the foreign policy course drawn up by Brezhnev. The aggressive plans of imperialism force us to maintain our military strength, Andropov said. The Soviet Union wants detente but does not want to pay for a normalization of relations with the United States by means of concessions.

A few hours later, President Reagan appeared on U.S. television. He announced that he had sent a proposal for confidence-building measures to Andropov. These include, for example, that the superpowers must give advance notice of all missile test launches and that the "hot line" between Washington and Moscow must be improved. The main number in Reagan's speech, however, was the long-awaited and long-prepared presentation of a new nuclear arms program. In the U.S. Administration's view -- which has not been contradicted by expert circles -- the Soviet Union now has strategic nuclear arms of such strength and accuracy that they would be able to destroy all land-based missiles in the United States in a single strike.

Now the Americans are developing a new generation of land-based missiles, the MX class, and a great deal of thought has gone into making them as invulnerable as possible. The final deployment plan that has been adopted -- and which Reagan explained on Monday evening -- the MX missiles will be deployed in dense "clusters" of hardened silos. It is a sad irony, the U.S. President said, that new arms are needed to prevent war, but the United States wants to pursue its peace endeavors along two parallel lines, deterrence and disarmament. Reagan hinted that the MX missiles -- which he christened 'peacekeeper' in his speech -- could be used as "barter goods" in the current negotiations with the Soviet Union in Geneva.

However, it is by no means certain that Reagan will be able to implement the MX project. The U.S. reactions to the President's speech have been very mixed. First, the new deployment system is extremely controversial. Its effectiveness can only be tested in war. Second, there is a growing body of public opinion in the United States opposed to further nuclear rearmament. Third -- and this is the most important factor -- Congress is raising increasingly determined demands for a drastic reduction in the defense budget. There will in all probability be a hard fight in Washington about the MX project, which will cost many billions of dollars if it is realized.

If anything, the conflict between more butter or guns should be even tougher in the Soviet Union, where the civilian sector has been left off to the side for so long. Andropov's speech to the Central Committee shows that he is prepared for drastic measures to break the trends toward decline in the Soviet economy. Those in power in the Kremlin have strongly committed themselves to giving priority to the needs of the defense forces and as yet no new thinking is apparent on this point.

However, it is probable that both superpowers have an insight that continued rearmament not only jeopardizes peace but also means economic burdens which would be intolerable in the long run. If this insight becomes the one which guides the U.S. and the Soviet negotiators in Geneva, it finally ought to be possible to reach a balanced agreement on the control of strategic arms.

SHULTZ REMARKS ON TIES WITH USSR 'NOT FRUITFUL'

[Olof Santesson editorial: "The Wait for Soviet Signals"]

[Text] Now, after Brezhnev's death, the Soviet Union has the opportunity to take the initiative for detente. The U.S. response would consist of preparedness to discuss such initiatives. With this fairly tough statement, U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz on his return from the funeral in Moscow raised his voice in the debate which has flared up in the United States. In doing so, he disappointed many people.

In principle, the U.S. secretary of state's assertion that it is the Soviet Union's leaders who have created the problems in the world comes as no surprise. Reagan was already saying so at the height of the election campaign in 1980. But this is not a fruitful point of departure for continued contacts between the superpowers. Shultz says that he is waiting for Soviet action -- at the talks on strategic and medium-range nuclear arms in Geneva, at the MBFR talks in Vienna and at the CSCE conference in Madrid. It is interesting that this demand actually accords quite badly with previous U.S. reports that the Geneva negotiations were making quite good progress. Shultz's line agrees more closely with the Soviet picture of negotiations which have reached total deadlock.

Weeks and months before Brezhnev's death, many people were discussing whether the Soviet Union had -- at least for the time being -- given up on the possibility of reaching some sort of nuclear compromise with the United States. Of course Moscow is deeply concerned by the risk that in the absence of an agreement, NATO will deploy new nuclear arms in Western Europe with a range stretching into the western Soviet Union. It is also tempting to fan the flames of dissent in the Western camp. West Germany's new Social Democratic leader Vogel seems to be opposed to NATO deploying new nuclear arms in Europe no matter what the situation.

It seems unreasonable to believe that the Kremlin's new leader, Yuriy Andropov, would be quick to chance an agreement with his most important rival, the United States. It could be difficult enough for him to get the Army and other interest groups to agree to concessions to his second most important rival -- China. It is true that the Chinese dismissed their foreign minister, Huang Hua, immediately after he had been in the limelight during his talks with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. The move has the effect of lowering the temperature and is extremely badly timed. However, it was expected and does not need to be interpreted as a relapse into Chinese toughness toward the Soviet Union.

It takes two to tango, President Reagan has said. The tango is danced at "quite a slow tempo... by couples using different holds for different steps with an...unusually rich configuration." Perhaps this is what Andropov is up to, unfortunately. Detente vis-a-vis Beijing, reduced tension along the border with China, would be able to release resources for continued Soviet-U.S. tension.

UN SPECIALIST ON U.S. ATTITUDE TOWARD UN BUDGET

LD291134 London BBC World Service in English 1309 GMT 16 Nov 82

[From the "24 Hours" program, presented by Alexander McCloud]

[Text] [McCloud] America's growing disenchantment with the United Nations has found further expression, with one of its delegates there serving notice that the Reagan administration intends to try to block any attempts to increase UN spending beyond existing budget limits. The U.S., he said, was alarmed that UN expenditure had increased fourfold in the past decade -- and in the last 4 years alone, by more than 80 percent. For the background to Washington's concern I've been consulting Peter Willetts, a specialist on UN affairs with the City University here in London.

[Willetts] Well, it seems that one of the things which has been emphasized in the recent statement is a worry that funds are going to the national liberation movements: That is, of course, to the PLO in the Middle East and to SWAPO [South-West African People's Organization] in southern Africa. Quite frankly, I don't think they have a reasonable case there. What is true is that UN money is going for relief of refugees in the Middle East and for educational training programs for people from Namibia, in southern Africa. But the idea that money is going directly towards the guerrilla organizations for their fight seems to me quite ridiculous: that is not happening though the UN.

[Question] Does Washington have an economic case in arguing that UN budgets are burgeoning unjustifiably?

[Answer] Well of course, the UN is a large bureaucracy and like all large bureaucracies there are doubtlessly places in which it could save money on some staff, save money on the volume of paper work that is done, save money on travel. But the room for such savings would not be very great. Basically, the UN is underfunded and not overfunded.

[Question] The U.S. is saying that the time has come to draw the line, but how in practice can it dictate to the rest of the UN?

[Answer] The only ultimate sanction it has is the threat to withdraw from the organization. It seems to me it would be untenable for the Americans to say they are going to stay in and refuse to pay up. And of course in conflicts with some of the UN specialized agencies this is what they have done. They withdrew from the International Labor Organization [ILO] because they were not happy with the general direction of decision-making there. But it would be a major step into isolationism for America to withdraw from the UN.

[Question] Would it cripple the UN financially?

[Answer] Well the ILO survived. Undoubtedly, the UN would survive, but it would have to undertake a crisis reevaluation of its programs and cut back by 25 percent, because that is the extent of the American contribution.

[Question] Are other Western countries sympathetic to the American position?

[Answer] There would be quite a number of Western countries which are not sympathetic. So, for example, the Scandinavians are highly committed to the UN; Canada, America's nearest neighbor, is highly committed to the UN; most of the smaller countries of Western Europe -- Ireland, Luxembourg and so on -- the evidence is that they have paid up their contributions quite happily. Interestingly enough, the only major rich country which is fully up to date in its contributions as of now, including payments for 1982, is Great Britain.

[Question] Nevertheless, with the United States in the driving seat, is the United Nations now at a crossroads politically and economically?

[Answer] It seems to me world politics is at a significant crossroads. The Americans under President Reagan have come into conflict in a minority of one or just two, at times, on many major issues. They are standing out against the law of the sea convention, they are standing out against comprehensive negotiations on North-South relations, they are even standing out against particular issues like the control of the marketing of baby food in the Third World. And to add to that, a crisis for the UN would produce a response in the developing countries, that there is no hope for international cooperation, that they are going to have rely on themselves to engage in new economic and diplomatic activity within the Third World, and go into confrontation with the North.

TELEGRAPH WELCOMES U.S. 'REARMAMENT' POLICY

[Editorial: "Andropov and Reagan"]

[Text] President Reagan's television address on Monday night appeared mainly designed to reassure the American public that Washington was doing everything it could to negotiate arms reductions with Russia, while at the same time emphasising Russia's superiority and America's determination to catch up. If his defence proposals were passed by Congress, he said, "it will still take five years before we come close to the Soviet level." The speech came just after he had announced plans for the deployment of 100 of the proposed new generation of intercontinental MX nuclear missiles, each able to carry up to 10 independently-targeted warheads. The MX, which is not yet in main production, is designed as the answer to Russia's supposed capability to knock out the whole of America's existing land-based strategic missiles in one surprise "first strike." The programme is highly controversial in Congress. There is also a growing movement in America calling for a "nuclear freeze."

Shortly before Mr Reagan's address, Mr Andropov, who is more and more clearly emerging as undisputed new Soviet boss-man, made his first public remarks about arms control and detente. They were gritty but not aggressive. Russia was not in favour of unilateral disarmament (surprise!). She would not make "preliminary concessions." Arms control negotiations should not be to set out differences but to reach results useful to all sides. There was no anti-American rhetoric in his speech.

Mr Reagan's address, his official stressed, was not drafted with an eye on the change of leadership in Moscow. It is too early to assess what kind of tone will prevail under Mr Andropov, but it is clear that he will prove an extremely tough negotiator. Given Russia's acute economic difficulties, however, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he will not be interested in arms control and reduction. Mr Reagan even had some encouraging words about first Russian reactions in the Geneva talks. The difficulties, as ever, lie in each side's differing perception of "superiority." For the moment, Mr Reagan must be right to press on with rearmament.

ARAB-PLO DELEGATION SHELVES PLANNED VISIT

LD282126 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2109 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Excerpt] An Arab delegation led by King Hassan of Morocco and including a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation is believed to have shelved a planned visit to London. It is thought that the sticking point was that the PLO representative would not have been received by the queen or the prime minister. But the delegation was offered an official meeting in London with, it is believed, a foreign office minister.

KIPRIANOU STRESSES NO PROGRESS ACHIEVED IN TALKS

[Text] President Kiprianou has once again stressed that the Turkish occupation troops must withdraw from Cyprus and a lasting solution found. This lasting solution cannot be based on the result of the invasion or on the idea of division and partition. In accepting the credentials today of the first Thai ambassador to Cyprus, Phaen Wannamethi, President Kiprianou also said no progress for a fair solution of the Cyprus issue has been achieved because of the totally negative and intransigent Turkish stand. He added: However, we will continue our efforts with the aim of promoting the implementation of the UN resolutions, which constitute an answer to our problem and prejudge the framework and the basis for a lasting settlement of the Cyprus issue.

In presenting his credentials, the first Thai ambassador referred to the visit that the late President Makarios had paid to his country in 1974, which led to the establishment of full bilateral diplomatic relations. Mr Phaen Wannamethi assured that he will exert every effort to preserve and develop the close ties of friendship and good will that exist between the two countries.

INTERLOCUTOR CRITICIZES UN SECRETARY GENERAL

NC280856 Nicosia ALITHIA in Greek 28 Nov 82 p 12

[Text] "In the past, the UN secretary general never reminded the parties of the fundamental UN principles and of how these principles and which of them were violated by the invasion and occupation. The settlement of the Cyprus issue by mutual concessions (that is de facto concessions on our part) was more important to him than a solution based on UN resolutions and principles and on international law. He had said nothing about Turkey, which was at fault, or about our people, who were wronged and victimized."

The above was stated by Greek Cypriot interlocutor A. Mavrommatis in a talk which he gave the day before yesterday at the Paralimni Lions Club. The subject of his talk was "The National Cyprus Issue and the United Nations." Mr Mavrommatis referred to the UN role in the Cyprus issue and put special emphasis on the important of the UN resolutions and decisions for Cyprus.

Referring to the presence of the UN peace force, Mr Mavrommatis pointed out the risk that with the lapse of time and the existence of the demarcation line, such an existence may develop in such a way that the maintenance of peace and the consolidation of the situation may become an end in itself instead of contributing to the solution of the problem.

DENKTAS VIEWS ON SOLVING TERRITORIAL PROBLEM

TA261224 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English 1115 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that territorial problem could be completely solved through compensation. The president was replying to questions following reports that the Greek Cypriots would be taking to the United Nations the issue of the allocation of property in northern Cyprus to Turkish Cypriots who had moved to the north from the south. He recalled that the Turkish Cypriots had been forced to become refugees three or four times since 1958, but agreements reached in 1975 and at the summit meetings in 1977 and 1979 had created a situation where this would never be repeated. He pointed out that the property left in southern Cyprus by the Turkish Cypriots was even more valuable than the Greek Cypriot property left in the north, and that this problem would be solved when agreement was reached on compensation.

President Denktas said that it was a question of taking measures so that the 19 years of usurpation of Turkish Cypriots' rights would not be repeated.

On another question, that the Turkish Federated State would have the Turkish lira as legal tender in northern Cyprus and that the Greek Cypriots would be taking this issue to the United Nations as well, President Denktas pointed out that the Greek Cypriots had not given Cyprus pounds to the Turkish Cypriot community unless they received the equivalent in foreign exchange. He said that the Greek Cypriots had usurped all the rights of the Turkish Cypriots who were drawing Cyprus pounds from the island's budget. He added that the Greek Cypriots had also confiscated the reserves of Turkish Cypriot banks lodged at the Cyprus Central Bank. He stressed that because of these facts, the Greek Cypriot complaints were invalid. President Denktas said that the Greek Cypriot partner in the Republic of Cyprus had usurped all the rights of the Turkish Cypriot partner, and regarded itself as the legal government responsible for the independence and sovereignty of the island. He stressed that this was a continuation of the Greek Cypriot actions against the Turkish Cypriot community in accordance with the infamous Akritas plan. He said that the Turkish Cypriot community had every right to take precautionary measures to ensure its rights and status. President Denktas said that the root of the Cyprus problem lay in the 19-year-old efforts of the Greek Cypriots to do away with the Turkish Cypriot rights. He stressed that he did not expect the present Greek Cypriot leadership to see these facts, but he expected the sensible Greek Cypriots to understand these facts and force their leaders to come to their senses. He stated that the Greek Cypriots should not spend time in recourse to the United Nations, but attach the necessary importance to negotiations with the Turkish Cypriot community.

Denktas' View Rejected

[Text] The government spokesman has stated that the position implied in a statement by Denktas -- that the territorial problem will be radically solved when the question of compensation is settled -- is categorically rejected by the Cypriot Government and the Greek Cypriot side. The reason is, the spokesman stressed, that the territorial issue is not nor can it be related to compensation.

The government spokesman went on: On the other hand, if with this statement Denktas is trying to question the right of refugees to return to their homes and properties, this is absolutely unacceptable. He added: This right is clearly and explicitly recognized in all UN resolutions on the Cyprus issue. It is an inalienable right that cannot be written off as a result of any action by the illegal Denktas regime.

Besides, the spokesman said, the Turkish Cypriot leader's allegation that the property left in the free areas by the Turkish Cypriots is of more value than the property which the Greek Cypriots were forced to abandon in the occupied areas is so ridiculous that it does not even deserve a denial.

Refugees' Rights Stressed

[Text] Speaking in Limassol at a meeting of the Free Kyrenia Association, President Kiprianou has reiterated that the signing of a solution of the Cyprus issue that would not secure in practice and would not completely safeguard the right of the refugees to return to their paternal homes is inconceivable and beyond discussion. President Kiprianou added: I refuse to accept as legal any allegation that a population exchange has taken place, just as I refuse to accept the exchange of property.

President Kiprianou further said: I do not question the fact that the struggle is difficult, that time has tremendous importance and that the fervent wish of the refugees and all the people is to achieve a solution as soon as possible. He added: I would like to stress once again that while time is important, the content of the solution has greater importance for us and we will not sacrifice the essence for time.

Continuing, President Kiprianou said: In order that we may be able to continue our struggle with the conviction that we will bring it to a happy end, it is necessary to safeguard the republic. This is why the government, along with all its other efforts to promote a solution of the Cyprus issue and for economic and social progress in the free areas, aims at safeguarding a lasting republic. On no account, he stressed, will he permit the undermining of the republic nor new treacheries of any form like those that opened the doors of Cyprus wide to the hordes of Attila in 1974.

SPOKESMAN REJECTS TWO-COMMUNITY REPRESENTATION

NC281925 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Text] The government spokesman has stressed that the United Nations recognizes only the legal government of the republic, which participates actively in multilateral and bilateral interstate relations. This fact dismisses the allegation that there are two separate autonomous communities as being utterly unfounded and contrary to reality.

The spokesman made this statement in reference to a statement by Turkish Cypriot Nail Atalay, by which he is trying to present himself as a recognized representative of the unlawful Turkish regime at the United Nations, in the United States and in Canada. The spokesman also stressed that the government of the republic is recognized by the United States and Canada, where Mr Atalay is vainly trying to pose as a recognized representative of the Turkish regime.

DENKTAS DEMANDS NEW GEOGRAPHICAL MAP, PROPOSALS

NC290756 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS TIS DHEVTERAS in Greek 29 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] Mr Denktas is demanding a new geographical map and proposals from the Greek Cypriot side "so that a discussion can be held at the intercommunal talks on the territorial aspect of the Cyprus problem." And this demand is followed by another one: The new proposals "must be reasonable"!

According to authoritative reports, this Turkish demand was put forward by Turkish Cypriot Interlocutor Onan during discussions on the procedure to be followed when the territorial question is discussed, creating more difficulties for the progress of the intercommunal dialogue.

Another issue which is also causing difficulties is the Turkish side's violation of the Kiprianou-Denktas summit agreement on the Varosha question, which must be given priority regardless of the course of discussion on the territorial aspect.

The Turkish side has made it clear that it does not consider the question of Varosha as a separate question and that it places it within the framework of the entire territorial problem.

In view of the Greek Cypriot side's insistence on respect for the summit decisions, with special emphasis on the question of priority for Varosha, it is observed that the Turkish side has led the intercommunal dialogue into a serious deadlock.

The new developments in the dialogue coincide with authoritative reports from UN headquarters that UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar -- in view of the forthcoming debate on the renewal of the peace force mandate for Cyprus -- has been evaluating the results of the intercommunal dialogue from the point of view of the two sides' reciprocity to the "Waldheim evaluation."

According to the same reports, prompted by the general as well as his personal desire for progress in the Cyprus problem, Mr Perez de Cuellar, after concluding his evaluation, will submit his appraisals and give an account of the positive as well as the negative points in each side's positions toward the discussion of the various aspects of the Cyprus problem.

REPLY TO TURKISH 6-MILE AIRSPACE LIMIT REMARK

NC262141 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Regarding the report broadcast by Ankara Radio that during the meeting of Greek Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmenon 2 October in Canada, Turkey had stated to the Greek foreign minister that for Turkish military aircraft flights, Greek airspace is limited to 6 miles, as are Greek territorial waters, Government spokesman Dhimitrios Maroudhas made the following statement tonight:

The agreement for the moratorium explicitly and categorically envisages that both sides, without abandoning their declared positions, would abstain from provocative actions and statements. What each side considers provocative actions and statements was discussed and agreed upon in detail during the talks of Mr Kapsis and Mr Alacam. Since 1931, Greece had determined the latitude of its airspace to 10 miles, something Turkey did not question for over four decades. Greece stands firm on this position. During the Kharalambopoulos-Turkmen meeting in Ottawa, it was agreed that the agreement on the moratorium should be extended until the new meeting of the two ministers, which was intended to take place in Brussels on 9 December. This clearly means that Turkey had committed itself to honor the moratorium exactly as it was agreed upon. Government spokesman Dhimitrios Maroudhas concludes: Any other allegation constitutes an unsuccessful attempt to justify the Turkish provocations.

NAVY EXTENDS MANEUVERS NOW IN PROGRESS

[Excerpt] Our navy had embarked since yesterday evening on a demonstration of its defensive readiness through the expanded development of the "Tornado" exercise, in which almost all of our naval forces are participating. At the same time, the III Army Corps will be moving to Thrace within the framework of the "Megas Alexandros" [Alexander the Great] maneuvers to be held next week in northern Greece.

The frigates "Limnos" and "Elli," submarines, helicopters and many other fighting vessels have now joined the "Tornado" exercise, which is under the personal direction of Fleet Commander Vice Admiral Ath. Giokezas. This exercise was to end today but, by a later decision, it will continue until the Turkish Navy maneuvers end in the Bosporus. A total of 12 destroyers, almost all the torpedo and missile boats -- except a few for security reasons -- 6 naval support helicopters and a number of submarines are participating in the "Tornado" exercise.

In the meantime, it has been learned that the Greek side exercised its NATO veto last week when the question was raised of modernizing a Turkish base in eastern Thrace, which is 100 kilometers from the Greek-Turkish and Turkish-Bulgarian borders. This base is destined to receive aircraft of the NATO mobile force, which is composed of units from various member countries of the alliance. On the other hand, in demonstration of its intransigence, Ankara yesterday rejected the government protest against the violation of our national airspace.

DER SPIEGEL INTERVIEWS PAPANDREOU ON U.S. BASES

[Text] Bonn, Nov 28 (AFP) -- Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou has said he opposes American military bases on Greek territory since they "only serve the strategic interests of the United States in the region." But Greece is negotiating with the United States on conditions for their continued presence, Mr Papandreou said in an interview to be published by the West German weekly DER SPIEGEL tomorrow. "The presence of foreign bases on our territory is a limitation of our independence and our national sovereignty," Mr Papandreou said.

He expressed the wish that Greece not be "party to any military bloc, not even NATO (the North Atlantic Treaty Organization)," but added that "any foreign policy decision must take into account Greece's security and national integrity" and that the two countries were currently seeking an accord on the issue of the bases: "Our two main conditions are that the bases not threaten our defense and national security, and that they not be used to launch actions against our Mediterranean neighbors with whom we have diplomatic, economic or political relations."

Questioned on the possibility of an "American guarantee for Greece's eastern border," Mr Papandreou said he preferred delivery of "modern weapons, AWACS (reconnaissance aircraft) for example...that strikes me as more realistic than an American commitment to protect us on our eastern border."

But the presence of American nuclear weapons on Greek territory did not enter into negotiations on American bases, he said, adding that "atomic weapons were the object of another subject of bilateral discussions with the United States."

Mr Papandreou said the idea of a denuclearized zone in the Balkans region would require another year and a half to iron out the problems, "particularly that of verification of dismantling of nuclear weapons."

The prime minister said the change of government in Moscow "gave the Soviet Union the chance to correct its attitude toward the West, and more specially the United States."

SPOKESMAN DENIES LUNS SUMMONED NATO ENVOY

NC291039 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 28 Nov 82 p 4

[Text] The government spokesman has categorically denied press reports on Friday alleging that Greece's ambassador to NATO, Mr Vasilikos, has been summoned by NATO secretary general, Josef Luns.

The same government spokesman said that the placing of the armed forces on a state of alert will continue until the date the major military exercise in northern Greece begins.

KKE-INTERIOR STATEMENTS ON FORMING SECRETARIAT

NC261355 Athens I AVYI in Greek 25 Nov 82 p 1

[Statement by the KKE-Interior Central Committee -- date not given]

[Text] The recent session of the KKE-Interior Central Committee has justifiably attracted the interest of the press. However, at the same time, because some of the press reports do not correspond to reality, we consider it advisable to clarify the following points:

1. The election of a three-member secretariat, headed by Central Committee Secretary Comrade Yiannis Banias, and with Comrade L. Kirkos and Comrade P. Kounalakis as members, strengthens the effectiveness of the functioning of the Central Committee and the cause of building a modern democratic and effective party and does not alert whatsoever the paramount jurisdictions of the Central Committee and of its Executive Bureau.

2. The party's Central Committee and its organs (the Executive Bureau and the Secretarit) will work -- as it is obvious -- on the basis of the resolutions of the party's third congress.

GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZES 6-MILE GREEK AIRSPACE

TA261523 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] It has been announced that Turkey had previously told Greece that it recognizes Greek airspace as 6 miles and that in their flights in the Aegean, the Turkish military planes will not obey any other [word indistinct]. Foreign Ministry spokesman Ambassador Nazmi Akiman was answering a question on whether during their meeting in Canada last month the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers agreed that Turkish military aircraft would not approach within more than 10 miles of Greece. Ambassador Akiman replied: During their meeting in Montreal, in order to prevent any misunderstandings, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen told Greek Foreign Minsiter Kharalambopoulos that our military aircraft would not obey any standards other than the one which says that Greek airspace extends like its territorial waters, to 6 miles. When an agreement was reached to hold a meeting between the two ministers in Brussels, Mr Kharalambopoulos was aware of this. Consequently, it is difficult to understand why such a loud noise is being made 3 months later.

FOREIGN MINISTRY ON TURKMEN'S 28 NOV USSR VISIT

TA261651 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1620 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Text] Ankara, 26 Nov (AA) -- Foreign Ministr Ilter Turkmen will go to Moscow on 28 November as the official guest of Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. During the talks in Moscow, the two sides will exchange views on issues concerning Turkey and the Soviet Union and [words indistinct]. During his stay in the Soviet Union, Turkmen will also visit the Azerbaijan Republic.

Foreign Minsitry spokesman Ambassador Nazmi Akiman described the visit as "a [word indistinct] which is expected to be favorable and useful despite the differences in the two countries' social, political and economic systems."

At his weekly news conference today, Ambassador Akiman discussed Turkmen's forthcoming visit to Moscow, saying that the most important aspect of the relations between the two countries was the commercial relations.

He pointed out that until recently, commercial relations between the two countries were conducted through the "clearing system," but that following protocols signed on 20 May 1982, they had reverted to the foreign exchange basis.

Akiman stated that a series of industrial installations were built in Turkey as a result of the loans and technical aid supplied by the Soviet Union within the framework of their cooperation since 196 [last digit indistinct]. He added that the bilateral economic and commercial relations would be reviewed and further developed at the joint economic committee meetings to be held in January 198 [last digit indistinct].

He recalled that Turkey imports machinery and equipment, iron and steel products, chemicals and heavy industry products from the Soviet Union and, in return, exports agricultural products, alumina, aluminum, calcium, textiles, leather goods and construction materials. He added that Turkey also imports 600 million kilowatt hours of electrical energy from the Soviet Union annually.

Ambassador Akiman said that the latest commercial situation between the countries is as follows: Turkey's imports in 1981: $163.6 million, and its exports: $193.6 million.

EVREN REITERATES BAN ON POLITICAL ACTIVITY

TA281719 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Public address by President Kenan Evren in Artvin on 28 November -- recorded]

[Excerpt] As you know, following the approval of the Constitution, the election and political parties bill is being prepared. There are some who are engaged in various political activities even before the bill is prepared. They are engaged in arbitrary party formations, with activities dealing with the establishment of parties. To be more accurate, they are desirous of inheriting the legacy of the former parties. I would like to point out that the communiques and decisions issued by the National Security Council have not yet been abolished. Martial law is in effect in Turkey. Political activities are banned. Such activities are banned until the election and the political parties laws are enacted and until an announcement is made that one is free to engage in political activities.

I would like to recall this fact. Parties can be established and political activities can be held when the political parties law is prepared and when we say that political activities can be resumed. I would like to remind all my Turkish citizens and those who wish to inherit the legacy of the former parties. We also see articles in the press inciting such activities. I would also like to warn our press that political activities are still banned. Let them not publish all sorts of rumors on who is to establish what kind of a party before its time.

Evren Address in Kars

[Public address by President Kenan Evren in Kars on 27 November -- recorded]

[Summary] My dear citizens, I have been delayed due to weather conditions. I apologize for making you wait. Upon entering the city I saw a poster saying "Welcome to our pasha who has stopped migration from this province." We are well aware of what happened in Kars prior to the 12 September operation. We were aware many were leaving the city. Now this has stopped. Those who had gone are coming back to their homes. However, we were not the only ones who stopped this migration. It was achieved through the will of the people.

My dear citizens, our Constitution was submitted to a referendum on 7 November. I was very happy to see that 97.5 percent of the Kars citizens voted in favor of the Constitution. I extend all my thanks to you. This province has seen many wars but it has always been part of the Turkish homeland and it will continue to remain so. "There are certain foreigners who have attempted to portray Kars as part of Armenia."

"I am calling out to them from here. This soil is Turkish territory. No one has a claim over this province. It belongs to the Turkish nation and it will remain so to eternity."

"My dear citizens, there were many who exerted a lot of effort to influence our citizens to vote against the Constitution. Among them there were various foreign radios. There are various radio stations which daily broadcast lies and slanders about Turkey. These are communist radio stations. They were engaged in propaganda. Furthermore, traitors who escaped from Turkey published (?papers) and brochures and sent them to Turkey." The leaders of former parties, former party members also engaged in propaganda against the Constitution. However, the result of the referendum shows that the Turkish nation is not influenced by such propaganda.

I thank you all for the warm welcome given us. I extend you my best wishes. I hope that the period prior to the 12 September operation which our Kars citizens experienced will never be repeated. I ask you to continue to support us. With your cooperation, the past will not return.

PRIME MINISTER VIEWS DOMESTIC, FOREIGN ISSUES

[Text] The Consultative Assembly has adopted the 1983 fiscal budget bill. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu has said that the government has tried to distribute equally among all sectors of the community the sacrifices that have to be made in order to pay the price of the past economic crisis. He added that efforts have also been exerted to prevent a repetition of the past crises.

Speaking at the Consultative Assembly in reply to criticisms leveled against the budget bill as a whole, Ulusu said that the fiscal budget has been prepared within the framework of plausible income estimates in a realistic manner and in line with the other goals of the government's economic policy. Giving information on the economic policy being implemented, Ulusu said: Our target is to overcome the traditional exports bottleneck of our economy and to relieve the burden on our balance of payments, which has been disrupted because of the two oil shocks in the last 10 years. Furthermore, we aim to accelerate development. It is not impossible to achieve this through classical methods but we will pursue methods beyond that. Our foreign currency exchange policy, which is supported by incentive measures being implemented, aims at export [words indistinct] in the long run. It would be wrong to isolate an economy for a long time to come with possibilities such as that which Turkey possesses but whose export share within the GNP is some 5 to 6 percent and whose import share is some 8 percent. It would be an illusion to expect our development to accelerate through such isolation. Therefore, I believe that the view that "our stability program has taken more time than necessary" does not accord with our needs. It is necessary to build a production structure that will enable us to open up world markets. We have been delayed; we should make up for lost time.

Noting that an inflation rate of 25 percent can not be ignored and that stability is the primary condition for a healthy development, Ulusu said that incentive measures for exports will be continued and that investments will be conducted in accordance with the principle of productivity. He said that the 1983 budget does not include new taxes and that, on the contrary, it introduces new possibilities to low income groups in terms of income policy and justice in taxation.

Pointing out that the energy sector accounts for the largest share of investments, Ulusu added that 19 irrigation projects will be completed within 1983 and that some 185,000 hectares of land will be opened to irrigation. He said that subsidies and payments to agricultural producers are being conducted in an orderly manner in accordance with the governments possibilities, and that this policy will be continued in a manner that will reward the farmers' labor.

Noting that the positive results of labor tranquillity are being felt in production and employment, Ulusu said that the meetings of the minimum wage committee have been started ahead of schedule in a bid to regulate the minimum wage in accordance with current conditions. He added that work is continuing, aimed at amending the pertinent laws in accordance with current conditions in a bid to regulate working conditions and to base employer-employee relations on just and realistic foundations.

Ulusu said the following on the issue of national education: The basic goal of our national education policy is to raise generations who believe in the Ataturk principles and who can courageously defend them if necessary. Furthermore, we are taking the necessary measures to enable our students graduating from high schools and universities to speedily find employment.

Ulusu said that the government is determined to secure the effectiveness and impartiality of the administration.

Ulusu later spoke on the government's foreign policy. He said that relations based on the principles of independence, sovereignty, respect for territorial integrity, noninterference in domestic affairs, justice and equality are being continued with respect to all countries. He added that sincere efforts are being exerted to establish close cooperation and mutual understanding based on this foundation.

Noting that the EEC has recently adopted a negative attitude toward Turkey and made negative decisions, citing various bottlenecks in the world economy, Ulusu said: We are continuously energetically warning the EEC countries that these decisions contradict the agreements that form the basis of the Turkish-EEC partnership relations. I would like to hope that our steps will yield positive results and that we will not be forced to take certain measures.

Noting that securing stability in the Middle East is necessary to ensure the security and prosperity of the countries in the region, Ulusu said that intensive efforts are being exerted to strengthen relations with Arab and Islamic countries. Noting that Turkey is making all possible efforts to continue its goodneighborly relations with Greece based on stability and mutual trust and understanding, Ulusu said that the Greek prime minister has still not renounced his efforts to keep the Greek public hostile toward Turkey. Ulusu continued: The Greek Government is trying to use our allies in this campaign against Turkey. As is known, Greece could cancel the (APEC) -82 exercise at the last moment which NATO prepared at great expense by putting forward the excuse that its request to include in the exercise Limni Island, which should be totally demilitarized in accordance with the provisions of a treaty, was rejected by the alliance.

Greece was not content with this assertion alone. It put forward a totally unfounded allegation to the effect that Greek airspace had been violated by Turkey on 24 November. It announced that it unilaterally cancels the meeting of the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers scheduled to be held in Brussels on 9 December. The Turkish aircraft conducted flights over the Aegean in accordance with the provisions of the Chicago agreement and with the International Civil Aviation Association regulations during the recent military exercise, as had been the case in all previous exercises. It should be noted that the Greek Government hastily announced that the Brussels meeting was cancelled before the invalidity of its allegations was pointed out. This can be interpreted as a lack of any intention by Greece to solve our existing problems through negotiations. It also shows that Greece finds beneficial the continuation of this atmosphere of tension and dispute between the two countries. We regret this unfounded and contradictory behavior. The following truth should always be kept in mind by the Greek Government: The Aegean islands, which are very close to our shores, are left to the sovereignty of Greece on condition that they are demilitarized in accordance with treaties because of the importance they have from the viewpoint of our security. Greece is openly violating its agreements. It is natural that Greece will be totally responsible for the negative results of this behavior.

Ulusu said that Greece insisted in not seeing that the Cyprus problem can only be solved through negotiations based on the formula of a bicommunal, bizonal, federal and independent Cyprus Republic.

Ulusu said that every possible effort is being exerted in the struggle against Armenian terror and propaganda and that there are attempts to establish cooperation with all countries in this field.

Speaking after Ulusu, Consultative Assembly Budget Committee Chairman Tandogan Tokgoz expanded on figures within the budget. Noting that the economy should have a structure ensuring continuity in exports and employment. Tokgoz said that the atmosphere of trust to be created following the announcement of the financial measures package might increase [words indistinct]. He proposed that one should be prepared for it.

The 1983 fiscal budget was then put to a vote and adopted. All of the 125 members who participated in the voting cast their votes in favor of the budget. Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak and Deputy Speaker Refik Kitapcigil, who chaired today's session, did not participate in the voting in accordance with the rules and regulations of the assembly. Thirty-one members were absent from today's session. The budget will be taken up by the National Security Council and will go into effect on 1 January 1983.

TURKMEN MESSAGE ON SOLIDARITY WITH PALESTINIANS

TA291204 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Excerpt] On the occasion of the international day of solidarity with the Palestinian people, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen sent a message to the chairman of the UN committee for the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people expressing Turkey's views regarding the Palestinian people. Turkmen expressed the hope that the Palestinian people's struggle for recognition of their legitimate and national rights would be concluded successfully as soon as possible. In his message, Turkmen said: The solidarity day this year carries very special meaning due to the sufferings of our Palestinian brothers following Israel's occupation of Lebanon. The tragic events in Lebanon gave rise to great indignation, and our country was horrified at the massacres carried out against the Palestinians, including women, children and old people, in the camps of Sabra and Shatila.

Turkmen said that Turkey believes that for a just and lasting peace to be established in the Middle East, Israel must withdraw from all the occupied territories and all the inalienable rights of the Palestinians, including their right to establish their own state, must be recognized. He recalled that Turkey supported all the draft resolutions within this framework submitted to the United Nations and the Islamic conference, adding that Turkey considered the latest peace initiatives as encouraging developments. He noted that Turkey believes that these developments will constitute the foundation for the talks that will bring a comprehensive and lasting solution to the Palestinian problem. Turkmen also said that Turkey appreciates the PLO leadership's brave and dignified behavior.

INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER CONTINUES VISIT

[Summary] On the second day of his official visit to Austria, Indonesian Foreign Minister Mokhtar Kusumaatmaja visited the Parliament, had talks in the Foreign Ministry, and was invited to a luncheon by Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr. "In a toast, Pahr stressed that he is very pleased with the continuation of the very fruitful dialogue with his Indonesian colleague, whom he visited in Jakarta 2 years ago. This is once again a confirmation of the good relations existing in all fields."

Minister Pahr stated that they agreed to continue the joint steps in the field of disarmament and referred to the support of Indonesia and the other ASEAN countries in the international Kampuchea conference, stressing that due to this support, two-thirds of the UN member states now agree that the Kampuchea problem can only be solved at a political level.

Minister Kusumaatmaja in his toast dealt, above all, with bilateral questions.

GDR'S FISCHER VISITS FOR BILATERAL TALKS

LD292028 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1902 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Brussels, 29 Nov [ADN] -- The GDR and Belgian foreign ministers, Oskar Fischer and Leo Tindemans, as well as the delegations headed by them, started political discussions on Monday in Brussels. Oskar Fischer is on an official visit to Brussels at the invitation of his Belgian counterpart.

Among the most important topics of the discussions are the international situation, concern over the escalation of tension as well as the striving for dialogue and balance by mutual willingness to reach understanding. During the exchange of ideas, both sides agreed that international conflicts have to be settled peacefully. Both sides share concern over the worsening of the international situation, although differing in their views over the causes. They support a policy of peaceful coexistence. In spite of differing views on the ways to achieve an improvement in the international situation, there was agreement that there is no acceptable alternative to peaceful coexistence. In the discussions, both sides expressed their interest in further expanding bilateral relations for which a solid basis had been created with the concluded treaties. The development of economic relations between the two countries was noted with satisfaction.

Following the first round of talks, an agreement on international legal assistance between the GDR and Belgium was signed. The cultural working plan between the two countries for 1983-84 came into force.

Leo Tindemans hosted a dinner in the Brussels Egmont Palace in honor of his guest from the GDR during which toasts were exchanged. In his toast, the Belgian foreign minister underlined the joint endeavors of the GDR and Belgian Governments for the preservation of peace and security in spite of the differing social and political systems. Good bilateral relations contribute to creating a climate of trust and understanding between East and West. "The fruitful dialogue between our two states is not restricted to political meetings. It concerns important areas of daily life such as trade, culture, health and many other things." The minister further said: "Our trade and economic relations are being watched with great interest by both sides." He assessed the results of the most recent meeting of the mixed commission as "the expression of a joint willingness to improve relations." The minister said it is "imperative that there be positive results in Madrid." It is also imperative for the security of Europe that the Geneva negotiations lead to concrete results.

Europe needs the strengthening and continuation of detente, Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer said in reply. "We reached a situation in Europe a long time ago in which more security can only be achieved by less arms, but not by the further stockpiling of nuclear and conventional weapons. For that reason, we are deeply concerned that American medium-range nuclear missiles are to be stationed in Western Europe in 1983." The international situation demands that agreements between the USSR and the United States on the limitation and reduction of strategic arms such as nuclear weapons in Europe not be delayed, Fischer said. It is necessary "to at last create an atmosphere at the Madrid conference which makes possible relevant solutions for all CSCE participants to the question which surmounts all others, that of securing peace."

The regular meetings of the GDR and Belgian foreign ministers is an expression of the willingness of both sides to contribute to better mutual understanding. The constructive spirit of these meetings is a beneficial contribution to the improvement of the general political climate.

KOHL ON REAGAN-ANDROPOV MEETING, HONECKER VISIT

LD291900 Hamburg DPA in German 1829 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl has renewed his proposal for a meeting between U.S. President Ronald Reagan and the new Soviet Communist Party leader, Yuriy Andropov. He said in an interview he gave to HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT (Tuesday edition), which was released by the Federal Press Office in Bonn today, that such a meeting should be in the American interest.

The chancellor said that the disarmament negotiations in Geneva will only succeed if the leaders in Washington and Moscow want them to succeed. Experience suggests that the negotiations might be facilitated if the partners knew one another and had talked together.

Asked whether he would soon visit Moscow, the chancellor said that this is not topical. Regarding a visit to Bonn by Erich Honecker, which has been mooted for some time, Kohl pointed out that he renewed the invitation after becoming chancellor. "But there is no fresh news about a forthcoming Honecker visit."

CHANCELLOR KOHL DEUTSCHLANDFUNK RADIO INTERVIEW

DW291345 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1005 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Interview with Chancellor Helmut Kohl by correspondent Karl Donat; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] There is a new leadership in Bonn, but no changes, at least not in German foreign policy. There has been a change in leadership in Moscow, will there likewise be continuity or will there be changes? Mr Chancellor, in your initial statements you were quite cautious. During the debate [in the Bundestag] CDU Deputy Floorleader Volker Ruehe spoke of historical chances of overcoming the political impasse. Having gained a certain distance from all this by now, what would you say: Wait and see, or that there are opportunities that should be promoted?

[Answer] The Soviet leadership is one which has always been based on continuity. It is an erronous picture of the leadership style and content in the Kremlin to believe that policies there are exclusively determined by one man after the pattern of, say, the tsar or the Stalin era. Since Stalin's death, it has been evident that a team participates in the leadership of the Soviet world empire. You could almost say it is a crew. This was true for Khrushchev and it was true for Brezhnev.

By the same token, it is true -- and this is the experience of the past two decades -- that the handwriting of the number one man turns out to be more or less prominent after a more or less short period of time. None of us can tell what the handwriting of the new CPSU general secretary will be like. We have taken note of his first speech. There is this or that bit of news on what he might be thinking. The Kremlinologists are roaming the world trying to compile forecasts. I am disinclined to have any part in this because I think this belongs in the realm of prophets and not in the sphere of realistic politics.

The new number one man in the Soviet Union finds himself facing the same problems which his predecessor left -- the difficult economic situation in the Soviet Union and also in the Warsaw Pact countries, that is, the Soviet sphere of influence, and a total depletion and slacking of the attraction of the Communist ideology on a worldwide scale, including in particular, in the Warsaw Pact -- the developments in Poland speak eloquently of this. The party there has actually collapsed after more than 40 years of communist rule.

Workers have fled by the hundreds of thousands, and the intellectuals, students and pupils by the thousands.

They now refer to the law and order brought by the military. It is a military regime, and Poland's moral strength is being representaed in the world by the Catholic Church, the very institution which the communists have been contending for decades is dead and devoid of any influence. I think that on the basis of a sober assessment, the Kremlin must try to cope with the present situation, and this leads directly into our domain.

For more than a decade, Soviet policy, specifically foreign and security policy, has been determined by a large-scale arms race. We are now approaching decisive negotiations in Geneva where the fundamental element is the question of whether it is possible to negotiate along the lines of the NATO dual decision and attain disarmament in the world. This meets with our full support and sympathy. I cannot tell whether General Secretary Andropov will provide new impulses in that respect. I can only hope that we will. All I can say is that we are prepared to and will contribute to ensuring that our American friends, as well as all others capable of doing so, are able to encourage and stimulate him to do this.

[Question] There seems to be some motion in the Eastern camp, Mr Chancellor, if one considers events in Poland. Likewise, there are reports and rumors concerning Afghanistan. Since the reports from Geneva sound much more optimistic than they did just a short while ago, it seems as though some progress might be achieved there as well. What is your assessment of this development?

[Answer] To begin with, I will state that our American friends are conducting the negotiations in Geneva in all earnestness and seriousness with the mandate of an on behalf of the alliance, and thus, also on our behalf. During my U.S. visit, I found that the U.S. President is following these negotiations with great personal commitment and that he is very much personally involved. Let me take this opportunity to state that I think that we in the Federal Republic, including the Federal Government, are well informed. I assume that the Americans are well aware of the seriousness of the situation in view of the international arms race and that they are doing what is humanly possible.... We will encourage them in that direction. This is why it is so necessary for the Americans as well as the Soviet negotiators to realize that unless these negotiations are successful in the sense of the NATO dual decision, we will have to decide late next year to go through with the missile deployment, and that we, the so-called West, will try to make up for lost ground vis-a-vis the Soviet lead in the arms race. We don't want to do this, but we will go through with it if the Soviet Union forces us to by intransigence at the negotiations and by inadequate readiness to meet us half-way.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, you mentioned the hope that the Soviet Union is also aware of the seriousness of the situation. Considering what you learned in Washington, can the West gather that it is?

[Answer] Once again, Mr Donat, I have to say that I hesitate to give an answer because whatever I may be saying would require the powers of a prophet, which I just don't have. I am much more modest. I have a great deal of learning and perhaps also knowledge, but this knowledge is not adequate enough to form a reasonable judgment which would be justifiable to the public as well. I think that we shouldn't venture into this territory either, but that we simply should make use of the opportunity that a new number one man is now in office in the Soviet Union, that he is obviously solidly settled -- to put it coloquially -- and that he might perhaps also now make use of the opportunity, and I say perhaps, to enter into a dialogue of commonsense with the West, with the Americans and with us, to achieve what we pursue: halting and reducing the excessive arms buildup.

[Question] You suggested a U.S.-Soviet summit dialogue, Mr Chancellor, do you also see any possibility for the West to encourage the Polish Government to take some more steps in the direction thus far pursued?

[Answer] I think the first part of your question is important because of its second part, Mr Donat. There will not be any really positive headway in Poland, no real development in the way of more human rights and in the sense of what Poland, too, has signed in the CSCE final act, unless the overall climate grows essentially better. I asked the U.S. President to consider reverting to his old suggestion of meeting with the Soviet head of party and state in view of the new personnel situation. U.S. President Reagan at the time, right after his inauguration and while hospitalized after the attempt on his life, wrote in a personal letter to Leonid Brezhnev that he was receptive to such a dialogue.

The Soviet side failed to respond. Now there is a new general secretary in office in the Kremlin. Things have moved ahead, and the situation has not become easier but more difficult and serious. In view of our objective of preserving peace and reducing and controlling arms worldwide, I think that what is at stake justifies that the world's two most important men of political responsibility get together. This always under the proviso, however, that these will be well-prepared talks at the proper time, that the timing will not serve any propaganda, but that such a meeting will take place with the aim of making some headway if at all possible.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, you called once again in the Bundestag for charity help for the people in Poland. Ther seem to be bottlenecks in Poland, especially in fodder grain and grain seed. The help of an individual will not suffice in that respect. Could and should the West help in these fields?

[Answer] To begin with, I think it is highly important for us in the Federal Republic to openly demonstrate our humaneness in view of the intensifying situation of distress in Poland. This is a commandment of charity, but I think it also is a historical opportunity. The annals of history contain a great deal about Germans and Poles. Grandiose chapters occured in the German-Polish contacts in over 1,000 years, over very long periods, by the way. But these chapters were especially darkened in this century by the terrible acts committed in Poland in the German name and, in revenge, by Poles against Germans.

In the interest of our children, our generation and the generation following ours, we want to work for peace and to to meet each other. This means that we are now in the fortunate position -- especially we who are living in the free part of our fatherland -- to have an opportunity to help. And Christmas veritably offers itself for carrying this idea, this appeal, out unto our people. This also is the reason why we, as the Federal Government, have once again exempted packages from postage fees in order to aid this assistance during the Christmas season. Beyond that, I think it is necessary to consider help in yet another way. Contemplations are being made to send to Poland within the framework of the EC those items you referred to as examples. Namely, fodder grain and grain seed. You know that there are still many small farms in Poland. If they use their grain seed for fodder in the winter now, or if the grain seed is used for bread, there will be a shortage in the spring, and you can practically take the next disastrous development for granted, as it were.

I believe that it is very important for us -- not just the German Government, but we in concert with our European friends in the Community -- to ponder the question of what we can do to help the people, for they are what matters: the people in Poland, and Poland is part of Europe. Poland represents an old European nation which has contributed greatly to European history. It is now up to us to help if we can.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, let me ask a somewhat fundamental question here in a related vein. How effective do you think sanctions are? Are they compatible with what you have said about East-West trade?

[Answer] It's debatable whether the sanctions imposed, which have now been retracted, are sensible or not. I think it is a rather academic question. The advocates of sanctions can also point out that the worldwide protest connected with the sanctions, for example, made it possible to get trade union leader Walesa released and to hope that others who are still incarcerated will be released in the foreseeable future. What is important to me is that the free world as well as we Germans who are fortunate enough to enjoy freedom -- in the Federal Republic of Germany at any rate -- speak out and do not keep silent, that we don't duck in out of cowardly opportunism, but state what we deem right whenever human rights, civic liberty and circumstances making life worthier of living and being more compatible with human dignity are at stake in Poland, because Poland is our neighbor, an important neighbor.

[Question] This leads up to another, even closer neighbor, Mr Chancellor: Your minister of state of the chancellor's office willbe going to East Berlin next week, following the visits by other ministers. Is something stirring there as well? What could lend itself to being moved, in your opinion, and where?

[Answer] What I said earlier with a view to the development in Warsaw also applies to the development in East Berlin. When the overall climate between East and West intensifies or gets icier -- to use this expression for a change -- there are far fewer chances to do anything for the people in Germany. When I took over the government I stated that as far as we are concerned, it is absolutely clear that the preamble of the basic law must form the goal of German policy. Even though I as a realist know that the nation's unity is not attainable tomorrow or the next day, of course, we, the Germans, adhere to it. I am sure that in saying this I am speaking on behalf of the vast majority of our compatriots on this side and beyond the Iron Curtain. And if one avers the unity of the nation, one must also endorse the utilization of every chance to achieve having the people from both parts of Germany getting together. This is the objective, in rough outlines, which the Federal Government's activities that you mentioned serve.

[Question] In your statement to the Bundestag, Mr Chancellor, you also touched on the disagreeable compulsory minimum currency exchange. Is the Federal Government prepared to make return concessions if the other side shows readiness to compromise? Or vice versa: Is a correction the precondition, even the prerequisite for new projects?

[Answer] First of all, I would like to point out that we -- I as the CDU chairman and then in all the years as the opposition leader in the German Bundestag -- have always advocated the position that the give and take in the relations between the GDR and the FRG must be balanced. The GDR is perfectly aware that the question of visitor traffic and minimum currency exchange is most urgent for us. It also knows that what is involved here is a unilateral measure that cannot be reconciled with the spirit of the agreements hitherto concluded.

Hence, I am not prepared to wage a discussion now, let alone in public, on what we will pay for the abolition of what we have been declaring a development of injustice. I don't think this is a reasonable basis for business.

KOHL, WOERNER ON NATO DUAL DECISION, SPENDING

LD291618 Hamburg DPA in German 1523 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Koblenz, 29 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl has called the Bundeswehr one of the most modern and best equipped armies in the world. During his first visit to the Bundeswehr in Koblenz, the chancellor also emphasized on Monday that the most modern army was of little use if soldiers lacked motivation. Kohl and Defense Minister Manfred Woerner attended a field exercise and discussed moral leadership with commanding officers and course participants.

The federal Chancellor once again endorsed the NATO dual decision and said that should the Soviet Union fail to agree by the end of 1983 at the Geneva negotiations to reduce its superiority in medium-range missiles, then this would be countered with modern U.S. arms. Kohl said that the only possibility of giving up Western arms as a counter was mutual renunciation of the deployment of medium-range missiles. However, he saw possibilities of a positive result at the Geneva negotiations. In Washington he had asked U.S. President Ronald Reagan to have talks with the new Soviet party chief, Yuriy Andropov, before the end of the Geneva negotiations.

Concerning FRG financial stringency, Kohl said that savings had to be effected in all areas, but not at the cost of defense strength. Defense Minister Woerner assured his audience that no army, air force of navy exercise would be cut for financial reasons. Woerner and Kohl advocated that the promotion backlog in the Bundeswehr be reduced. As a first step, the government would create 350 new jobs, which would lead to personnel movement involving 1,500 jobs, the defense minister said.

CARSTENS MEETS WITH GREEK PRESIDENT KARAMANLIS

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- European unification, the problems within NATO and the situation in the eastern Mediterranean were the topics of a 1-hour talk between President Carstens and Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis on Monday.

According to a presidential office spokesman, there was agreement between Carstens and Karamanlis, who have known each other for some time, on the need for political unification within the framework of the European Community. Carstens thanked Karamanlis for the work done by Greek guestworkers in the FRG. The talk was followed by a luncheon at Villa Hammerschmidt that was attended by Bundestag President Richard Stuecklen and the chairman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag group, Alfred Dregger.

Kohl Receives Karamanlis

[Excerpts] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) -- Problems of the European Community were the central topic of a talk between Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis. Kohl gave a luncheon for the Greek politician in the chancellor's office.

In a talk with Genscher at Castle Gymnich near Bonn, Karamanlis expressly supported the political integration of the European Community and the Italian-German initiative for new efforts toward a European union. Genscher explained Bonn's Ostpolitik of the "extended hand," a spokesman later said. In addition, the foreign minister expressed the hope that Greece and Turkey might succeed in harmoniously solving their problems in the near future.

Karamanlis, who is on a private visit to the FRG, restricted his political contacts on Tuesday to the meeting with Genscher and Kohl.

Genscher Report on Talks

DW291528 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in Germany to East and West Germany 1930 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher by reporter Szente, date and place of interview not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] The news agencies in the Federal Republic commented on your Budapest visit by saying that you thereby intended to continue the close contacts with Hungary which is an especially important contact for German foreign policy in the Warsaw Pact. You spent only 24 hours in Hungary. What issues took precedence, and were you able to deal with all points at issue in the talks with your interlocutors in such a short period of time?

[Answer] We had a very compressed sequence of talks which gave me a chance to expound the policy of the Federal Republic of Germany to First Secretary Kadar, to the premier and to my colleague, the foreign minister. We discussed German-Hungarian relations which are largely devoid of problems and which excel through particularly close cooperation and very good economic cooperation. As you know, we have most, and the most successful, joint economic ventures with Hungary.

In addition, we also had an exchange of views on important international issues, such as, of course, East-West relations and questions concerning disarmament and arms control. I told my Hungarian contacts about the view and intention of the Federal Government to contribute to the stabilization of the international situation and to progress in cooperation and in the relaxation of tensions through a policy of the outstretched hand. It is generally known that we highly value the Hungarian leadership as a contact to talk to and that even where divergent views exist, and they do exist, the assessment by the Hungarian leadership is valuable to us.

[Question] Mr Minister, how did the Hungarian leadership react to the government change in Bonn?

[Answer] The Hungarian leadership did what goes without saying, namely, regard the change in the FRG Government as an internal affair of the Federal Republic of Germany and solely judges the German-Hungarian relations by the foreign policy pursued. What was important to the Hungarian leadership in this respect was the continuity, clarity and predictability of the FRG's foreign policy. When I mentioned our pursuit of a policy of the outstretched hand, First Secretary Kadar said that this is also in keeping with the view of the Hungarian leadership.

[Question] Has the detente policy of the Christian-Liberal coalition been newly rephrased?

[Answer] No, we continually keep on with it on the basis of the treaties concluded and under observance of the Final Act of Helsinki, having the clear objective of contributing to the improvement in the East-West relationship.

[Question] Mr Minister, early this week you presented in the Bundestag your ideas about a conventional balance. I believe that initially, Mr Falin in Bonn also favorably reacted to this idea. Did you bring up the subject in Budapest as well?

[Answer] Anyone talking about questions concerning disarmament and arms control must not speak solely of intercontinental-strategic weapons and medium-range weapons but also of the problems concerning the conventional balance in all of Europe. In all of Europe, therefore, does not just mean the territory covered by the MBFR negotiations conducted in Vienna, because we are interested in the consideration of all aspects contributing to the balance. Consequently, it was a foregone conclusion that I brought up the problems inherent in this issue in Budapest as well. We will also do this in other talks that will be upcoming.

[Question] You just mentioned the slogan of the policy of the outstretched hand, Mr Minister. As you just said, Hungarian party boss Kadar has reaffirmed this maxim toward the West as being his own as well. If this is true, all the two hands have to do is clasp. But isn't it true that considerable differences of opinion prevail, for instance as far as the NATO dual decision or the Polish issue are concerned?

[Answer] I mentioned in the beginning that differences of opinion do exist. I think a policy which would seek to ignore these differences would be irresponsible. On the contrary, it is the very objective of talks between West and East to try to find out where existing differences of views, existing contradictions, could be overcome. This is the significance of such talks. Only, it is important that both sides hold such a dialogue with this objective in mind.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH YAR COUNTERPART ON MIDEAST

[Text] Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and 'Ali Lufti ath-Thawr, foreign minister of the Yemen Arab Republic, [YAR] had an extended talk on Middle East affairs in Bonn today. Genscher stressed the direct continuation of German policy concerning the Middle East on the basis of the EEC Venice resolution, which allows the PLO the right of participation. According to a German spokesman, Genscher emphasized his profound conviction that the Middle East problem can only be resolved by implementing the Palestinians' right to self-determination.

Both men expressed their satisfaction at the 'excellent state' of bilateral relations. Genscher expressed the Federal Government's readiness to continue its development aid to Yemen. The Arab foreign minister, who will be visiting Munich, Stuttgart and Berlin, extended an invitation to Genscher.

CHANGE IN BONN'S DEVELOPMENT POLICY REPORTED

DW291732 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 29 Nov 82 p 1

[Article by Rolf-Dietrich Schwartz]

[Text] Bonn, 28 November -- A change has appeared in outlines in the FRG's development policy toward the Third World states whish has so far been supported by all parties represented in the Bundestag. The draft of the Federal Government's 5th development policy report which was begun by the SPD/FDP government and has now been revised in all essential fields by the new experts of CSU Development Minister Juergen Warnke, differs from the line pursued by Bonn so far.

According to a letter by the staff of the ministry accompanying the report to Minister Warnke, the new draft differs from the previous one in that it:

-- "Relativizes the importance of the North-South difference as a potential conflict and places more emphasis on the East-West dimension of conflicts in the Third World;

-- "Foregoes critical remarks regarding the United State's Third World policy;

-- "Largely avoids statements on the problems in Southern Africa (front-line states and liberation movements);

-- "In a modified way assesses the report of the independent (Brandt) Commission for international development problems;

-- "Assesses multilateral development cooperation and the North-South dialogue in a more reserved way; and

-- "Drops the reference to the negligible development-political significance of the tax law on developing countries."

The change in the development-political strategy of the new conservative-liberal Federal Government was already recognizable early in November when Warnke gave a speech to the Hanns-Seidel Foundation which is close to the CSU. There are apprehensions in the Development Ministry that in view of the disturbed relations between the CSU and FDP, CSU boss Franz-Josef Strauss will use this department headed by a CSU politician to implement his own foreign policy ideas.

NAVY CHIEF FROMM ON LESSONS OF FALKLANDS WAR

LD291732 Hamburg DPA in German 1608 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Kiel, 29 Nov (DPA) -- Vice-Admiral Guenter Fromm, commander in chief of the Navy, said in Kiel today (29 Nov) that the German Federal Navy will have to draw farreaching conclusions from the Falklands war. The information at hand makes it clear that crews need better protective clothing against fire at sea and that ships must be cleared of combustible material.

One will have to think about equipping units with fire extinguishers and using hydraulic appliances which, by reason of hydraulic fluid, are much more sensitive than electrical appliances.

Fromm also dealt with the Navy's personnel problem. He is worried about the lack of noncommissioned officers. At present, over 1,000 posts are unfilled, meaning there will be a shortage of professional servicemen at the end of the eighties. He conceded that land-based noncommissioned officers posts could be filled by women if the relevant law is passed.

MITTERRAND VIEWS FOREIGN, DOMESTIC ISSUES

PM291705 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Nov 82 pp 1, 8, 9

[Interview with French President Francois Mitterrand by Jacques Amalric, Philippe Labarde and Jean-Marie Colombani -- date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] Mr President, you have kindly agreed to answer our questions on current problems. We will discuss domestic and foreign policy with you, knowing in advance that we will have to arbitrarily choose the subjects which deserve attention. And we will immediately begin by asking you what you think of the new situation created in Moscow following Leonid Brezhnev's death and Mr Andropov's appointment.

[Answer] Two conflicting thoughts come to mind. The first is that, regardless of what anybody says, one change of face always leads to others. Accession to a position of responsibility creates new obligations. Even if it does not change the convictions of the man in that position, he sees things from a different angle. It is up to him to act and decide. And he does so according to his temperament, inclinations and experience, and Mr Andropov seems to be a gifted man. It would, therefore, be imprudent to say that things will be no different under him than they were under Leonid Brezhnev. The second thought is that Mr Andropov is the product of a system and that there is no reason why the tree should not produce the same fruits: A Khruschchev-type adventure does not happen very often. Whatever happens, Russia will seek to preserve its sphere of influence, guarantee its security and continue its ideological and political advance on all continents. Those are the constant elements of the state of power. To forget them would be fatal. But how many changes and approaches are possible, and ultimately determinative, according to whether the state of power adapts to the balance or to its opposite: that is particularly the case since successions are opportunities to adjust the accounts and review the situation. In that connection, I expect the new Russian leadership to move more on the question of Afghanistan than on that of Poland. In that connection, Mr Andropov's first meetings are significant: China, India, Pakistan. The Western countries may soon reproach themselves for underestimating Asia. Finally, I still think that Soviet policy will seek in peace what it could not obtain by war, the price of which it knows better than any other country in the world.

[Question] Was the fact that you sent Premier Mauroy to the funeral a political gesture?

[Answer] The fact that France was represented by the head of the republic's government simply recalled that the Franco-Russian relationship is still part of our history in the past.

[Question] Will this change of leadership in Moscow prompt you to review French policy?

[Answer] There is no reason for me to review French policy. Things are perfectly clear in our relationship with the Soviet Union. If I notice an imbalance in the world balance of forces, I say so and act accordingly. For example, the Russian nuclear force, tactical or otherwise, combined with its conventional forces, creates an imbalance in Europe which must be remedied. I will continue to say so. Hence, the importance of negotiations on disarmament and the need to achieve success. The Soviet Union has a great and legitimate concern for its security. So do we. It must understand why I refuse when it tries to include the French forces in the East-West reckoning.

The United States and Russia have the means of destroying each other several times over. Disarming, or rather slowing down their excessive rate of armament (that is what the Geneva negotiations are all about), leaves them a huge margin of safety. That is not the case with France. Abandoning any of our existing means of defense would amount to resigning ourselves to the whims of more powerful countries. No argument will make me change my opinion on that. On the other hand, I am hostile to any form of economic blockade on Russia, and France will not break off its trade with that country. But I would add that a lasting and excessive balance of trade deficit to our detriment would very quickly take on regrettable political significance. Nobody doubts that I will be faithful to the pledges made together with our allies on so-called strategic products. But I do not want us to insidiously reach the point of calling the sale of butter or chickpeas to Russia strategic.

Plain talk is always the best way of reaching agreement. Agreement? Yes. Without glossing over any of the essential points: our independence, our civilization, human rights.

[Question] The Soviet leaders are very sensitive about the formal aspects of relations.... What preconditons do you pose for an official visit to the USSR?

[Answer] I will talk to you about that when the question arises. The only permanent precondition for a meeting in Paris or Moscow is, in my view, that it should be useful. It should be useful for France. It should be useful for peace. It should respect our principles.

The People in Control in Poland

[Question] What is your assessment of the latest events in Poland?

[Answer] Aside from Moscow, it is the Communist Party and the church which controls the situation.

One evening last year, Mrs Thatcher asked me a question when we were in London at one of those informal dinners characteristic of summit meetings. She said to me: "What will Walesa do?" I replied: "What will, what can, the secretary general of the Polish Communist Party do?" In the past, I wrote that an independent trade union was incompatible with the Soviet system, at least for a long time to come. But the Communist Party in Poland, the only communist party, which in this case, is not all. So I also said to Mrs Thatcher and her guests: "Look at what the Catholic Church is doing also and you will have the answer to your questions."

[Question] A final question on the Eastern bloc countries: What is the state of relations with Romania following that famous Tanase affair [reference to Romanian emigre given protection by French security services following alleged threats to his life from Romanian authorities]?

[Answer] I have nothing new to say about that. The Romanian and French peoples have strong historical ties. I am anxious to preserve them.

[Question] Are you not sometimes surprised by the stormy aspect of Franco-Spanish relations?

[Answer] Yes. When I visited Spain I did not anticipate that the press would be so hostile toward France. However, the welcome given by the king and the political leaders was in keeping with that country's great traditions of hospitality. And the people in the streets were friendly. I tried to understand that difference in attitude.

The Franco-Spanish dispute, which is not new, essentially relates to the situation in the Basque country and to Spain's entry into the Common Market. I tried to exorcise the evil spirits which are poisoning our discussions with Spain and approached those two subjects squarely and openly. I think that my visit achieved progress and that the Spanish, to whom we owe respect and friendship, better understood our interests and reasons.

[Question] How do you now view the development of those relations? What about the question of terrorism?

[Answer] We had begun to tackle that bone of contention with King Juan Carlos and Mr Calvo-Sotelo and had decided on a meeting of the foreign ministers, the agriculture ministers (in connection with expansion) and the interior ministers (in connection with terrorism) when the Spanish crisis broke out, leading to new elections. The mutual goodwill which existed before Felipe Gonzalez's election is bound to be strengthened now.

[Question] Is the decision to extradite in cases of violent crime primarily aimed at the Basques?

[Answer] No, not particularly. There must be a legal situation applicable to all cases, to the Bologna assassins just as much as to Aldo Moro's assassins or the Rue des Rosiers assassins. According to the principles picked out by Robert Badinter and adopted by a recent cabinet meeting, violent crimes committed in the service of an ideology in countries where law and freedom govern society can justify extradition. Of course, that is subject to many conditions which the justice minister perfectly explained.

Protecting Southern Europe's Products

[Question] What do you plan to do regarding expansion?

[Answer] I have repeatedly said that Spain, which is part of Europe through its history, geography and culture, also fully belongs to it through its courageous return to democracy. But, as is known, expansion poses difficult questions at the economic level. I wrote to European Commission President Thorn a few months ago to explain my viewpoint to him and to recommend a methodology. I cannot expose France to the danger of finding itself in a 12-member Europe (the Ten plus Spain and Portugal) in which it would be forced to invoke the rule of unanimity on every issue and hence on occasions when it ought not to apply. That would precisely run counter to its idea of a just implementation of the treaty of Rome. However, it would not be able to avoid that if the clauses governing Spain's entry into the Common Market were not tackled now, especially regarding agriculture (wine, fruit, vegetables, oil-yielding crops, flowers) and fishing in the Mediterranean. The lack of interest shown by most of our present partners for Mediterranean products and the absence of series guarantees in the framework of the existing Community prompt me to be cautious and to avoid leaving the vital interests of several French regions to the arbitration of countries which only think of protecting their products and not those of other countries. I explained that to the Spanish. The creation of the right conditions for loyal competition which is tolerable for both sides now depends on a frank explanation. I hope to achieve that.

[Question] That presuppoes a readjustment of the common agricultural policy....

[Answer] It presupposes that the European Ten should strengthen their agricultural policy and protect the south's products as they protect the north's products.

[Question] Is France going to extend its political cooperation with Egypt?

[Answer] We have great political harmony and good personal understanding with Egypt. This atmosphere of trust made it possible to present the Franco-Egyptian resolution on the Near East to the Security Council and explains the constant consultation between our two countries. The series of events which took place even before As-Sadat's death, such as the Iraq-Iran war, are gradually restoring the leading role which Egypt has the vocation to play in that region of the world.

For Mutual Prior Recognition Between Israel and the PLO

[Question] How do you assess the evolution or nonevolution of the Israeli-Arab negotiations?

[Answer] I approved of the Camp David agreement to the extent that it prepared the way for peace between Israel and Egypt. What struck me as illusory was the aspiration to settle Palestine's fate without the Palestinians. No other country in the region has joined Camp David and what we are now left with are the previous facts without which peace is a meaningless word. You talk of negotiations, but there are none. Will the PLO announce that it is prepared to recognize Israel's de jure existence if Israel accepts the Palestinians right to self-determination? In any case it seems clear that Israel is not prepared to recognize the PLO. The Fes proposals, like those of King Fahd, have the advantage of offering a method and paving the way for dialogue. But each must decide to emerge from the sphere of what is left unsaid. Without prior mutual recognition, nothing, no, nothing, will be achieved.

[Question] So does your precondition for receiving Yasir 'Arafat lie in that conditional pledge by the PLO?

[Answer] It is not for me to pose conditions. I have simply expressed the wish that the PLO might renounce its objective of destroying the state of Israel. It would thus create a new political factor which everyone would have to take into account.

[Question] Are you not pessimistic about the evolution of the thinking of Israel?

[Answer] None of that country's major political forces is prepared for the creation of a Palestinian state on the West Bank. That is a fact which opposes all mental speculation. That does not mean that there is not a wide diversity of opinions in Israel on the way of viewing the Palestinian situation, especially since the Lebanon war.

[Question] You cancelled your trip to Bucharest. Why did you meet with [Guinean President] Sekou Toure?

[Answer] The restoration of normal relations between Guinea and France had been sanctioned by my predecessor's visit to Conakry. It was natural that I should receive the Guinean head of state in France.

[Question] How do you view the situation in Chad?

[Answer] When I was elected in May 1981, the Libyans were occupying Chad. A few months later they had left. I welcomed that. It is high time that that country should be freed from foreign pressures and interventions. That would be a good thing for it and for Africa as a whole. But peace there is precarious. France, for its part, will continue its aid for rebuilding Chad and will support any action which will guarantee its unity and independence. However, it is not for France to decide who should govern Chad.

I use the same argument for all the African states. We have preferential relations with many of them. Our agreements will be respected everywhere and our cooperation in Africa will remain a priority. But it is not for us to interfere in their internal struggles.

[Question] The Latin American countries were disappointed by France's abstention on the UN resolution concerning the Falkland Islands.

[Answer] France condemned Argentina's military intervention in the Falkland Islands and supported Britain, its ally, which had been attacked in this instance. But it did not recognize British sovereignty over those islands. We would have voted for the Latin American countries' resolution if it had been limited to recommending negotiations and giving the UN secretary general a good offices mission. Unfortunately, the reasons invoked in this resolution prejudged the outcome of the debate by attributing responsibility to Britain for a "colonial act." Geographical consideration cannot be the sole criterion for that assessment.

[Question] In adopting that position were you thinking of other islands which France possesses throughout the world?

[Answer] Many other factors came into my decision. But in fact, I do not want France to vote for something which, in some cases, might subsequently be turned against it.

[Question] What do you think of bilateral relations with Israel which are rather bad?

[Answer] France was among the first to recognize Israel in 1948 and, since then, it has maintained official, diplomatic relations with that country. But we were living in a hypocritical situation: We were pretending not to know each other. I found that attitude unacceptable. I feel no false shame in declaring my attachment to that people, and my concern to see that state firmly rooted on its land. That is why I decided to visit Israel in keeping with my promises. In the same way I lifted the discriminatory measures which applied to our trade. In so doing I was aware of the fact that I was exposing myself to the misunderstanding of the Arab countries which, however, knew that I remained faithful to our age-old ties. They took some time to listen to me and turned a deaf ear to my Knesset appeal. The right of the states in the Near East to live in peace and security and the right of the peoples in that region, as elsewhere, to determine their own future, are the simple credo of a policy which speaks with one voice. That does not please everybody at the same time. But I am convinced that that is how France will acquire or regain everybody's respect and, ultimately, friendship. Mr Begin criticizes me for helping win over the United States to the course outlined by the resolution presented by France to the Security Council in the Lebanon affair. We have duties toward the latter country. I could not remain silent while West Beirut was being destroyed by bombs. Was it not ultimately the demand for the PLO to leave that city safely and with dignity and for an intermediary force to intervene which prevailed? It would have been better to accept it immediately.

Today we still support President al-Jumayyil's demand that foreign armies leave Lebanon. Is that acting against Israel's interests? I think the reverse is true. I can oppose a particular aspect of the foreign policy pursued by the Israeli Government without running the risk of appearing as an enemy or bad friend of that country. I have a clear conscience and my friendship is intact. Nothing forces me to tolerate injustice, whatever its source.

The Atlantic Alliance Is Leaning Toward Misunderstanding

[Question] Didn't the failure of the Versailles summit rather "dispel" Atlanticist feelings? You spoke of the need to reform the Atlantic alliance several times during you election campaign. Despite the controversy over the gas pipeline, do you intend to make specific proposals on that subject or are you going to resign yourself to the deterioration in these relations?

[Answer] What you refer to as a failure in Versailles was already a failure in Ottawa 1 year earlier and will be a failure in Williamsburg next year if the summits in question continue to be propaganda platforms for internal political use, as I found them when I arrived at the Elysee. The Atlantic alliance has been leaning toward misunderstanding for too long. If a decision was taken to clarify matters, that would already be a favorable reform. That is what France did with regard to the gas pipeline and the U.S. embargo. That is also what it did by refusing to describe something which what was not an agreement as an agreement on East-West trade. France's sovereignty is not open to bargaining. I do not like that to be forgotten. But neither am I resigned to the deterioration in an alliance which would be more precise and effective if it moderated its appetite.

[Question] Do you think that the political situation in Europe makes the possible presence of Pershing missiles plausible? Do you honestly think that the Pershing missiles will be deployed if the Soviets do not want to negotiate?

[Answer] The only way of preventing the deployment of the Pershing missiles would be to succeed in Geneva.

[Question] What is your feeling about the evolution of the Nicaraguan regime?

[Answer] The Central American peoples need to liberate themselves from the economic and political guardian forces which are dominating and exploiting them. It is up to the West to understand that. If it chooses to fight an emancipation which I regard as legitimate, it will give communism a chance. It may already by too late. I hope not.

Recovery in the Years 1984-1985?

[Question] Let us turn to economic questions if you do not mind. Do you think that the difficult period in which we have been living for several years is about to end or do you think that what is commonly called the crisis will continue for a long time yet?

[Answer] It would be a mistake to think that the crisis will end in 1983, as some people thought it would end in 1982. But to fail to predict a recovery in 1984-1985 would be to strain the Western world's resistance capacity and to doubt its leaders' abilities, more than is reasonable.

[Question] Do you think that the return to major balance [grands equilibres] is an old-fashioned concept, or do you think that economic recovery in France depends on the acceptance of a relatively conventional management of our finances and our economy?

[Answer] I am surprised to hear you talk of a "return" to major balances because, for the past 7 or 8 years, so-called conventional management has been characterized by imbalance. In France it has produced 14 percent inflation.

Unemployment has rapidly increased; between 1975 and 1980 the state budget varied, according to whether it was a good year or a bad year between a deficit of Fr 10 billion and Fr 40 billion, the farmers' purchasing power constantly fell; and foreign trade reached a Fr 61 billion deficit in 1980. In noting that, I am not trying to level retrospective accusations. There were competent, talented people among the officials at that time. France has never lacked such people. The fact that they were forced to bend under international constraints without countering them with an adequate national recovery policy is now a matter for history and the historians to assess. Let us therefore only talk of a "return" to major balances in gauging the distance still to be covered.

[Question] The question could be put to you in a different way. Do you advocate respect for the major balances?

[Answer] Of course. The state budget can certainly put up with a deficit, provided it remains within reasonable limits and is an incentive to economic development. But let us beware of abusing it: That is why I informed the government of my intention to keep it to 3 percent of the gross domestic product [GDP] which makes that deficit, together with that of Britain, the lowest of all the industrialized countries. I would like to recall that the U.S. budget deficit is 4 percent of its GDP this year, and Germany's which was 4 percent, has just risen to 5 percent. Inflation is falling in those countries. It will drop below 10 percent in our country in 1982. That is still too high, but it is moving in the right direction. We want to reduce it to 8 percent in 1983, and then to 5 percent. Every effort will be made to succeed. The upward curve of unemployment in France is now the flattest of all the large West European countries. That is not enough, but we are making the necessary effort in that sphere too. That leaves the foreign trade deficit which is still clearly excessive. We have failed to remedy the situation, partly because of the dollar's high value. I intend to devote our priority effort to that crucial aspect of our economy.

The Purchasing Power of the Less Well-Off

[Question] Are sacrifices needed regarding living standards and consumption to overcome the crisis?

[Answer] Let us not forget that the available income of households will have increased by an average of around 2 percent this year and that in 1983 it should increase further, but by a little less than 1 percent. Indeed, it is necessary to take account of factors such as social redistribution in making the calculation. Nonetheless, a major effort is necessary now because while the crisis lasts, national duty requires that all means be mobilized. The government will protect the purchasing power of those who are less well-off. The drop in purchasing power for those for whom that reduction does not mean a noticeable drop in their standard of living does not pose the same problem. In the past, the real sacrifices were always required of the same social classes. It is time to act differently and to realize that no national effort is possible without there first being social justice. That rule of conduct will inspire the government.

[Question] Will the protected purchasing power be twice the minimum wage?

[Answer] That question will have to be debated. In that connection allow me to return to a point which is dear to my heart. Despite a tenacious legend, past experiments have never practised real economic stringency. Thus, it was possible to restore a great deal of balance by turning to those who had the most. That was not the case. It was not that officials did not think of that or did not want to do it.

But, for fear of displeasing their political supporters, their stringency was merely a social stringency. I repeat that it is the same social classes which hitherto have made most sacrifices. Reversing the trend presupposes a good dose of energy...and an equally large dose of wisdom. Customs and habits are less easy to change than laws.

[Question] The increase in obligatory contributions has continued in 1982 and is to continue in 1983 despite your election promises. Does that development strike you as inevitable?

[Answer] The effects of past policy combined with those of present policy are tending to increase those contributions. They increased from 36.3 percent to 42.9 percent in 1974-1981 and are now around 44 percent, which is indeed more than I promised. I want that percentage to drop. How can that be done? To be precise, let us note that the state's fiscal pressure, around 19 percent of GDP, has not increased. It is social spending, particularly health spending, which has constantly increased for many years. Although it is appropriate to be strict in administering the state budget, it is even more necessary to control the increase in social budgets. I have asked the premier and the ministers responsible to see to that. Provisions will be made in the 1984 budget to ensure that the total percentage of fiscal and social contributions is at least stabilized before starting to reduce them. Making the country's economic life more flexibile by limiting and then reducing obligatory contributions will boost initiative, reduce bureaucracy, improve competition and, finally, best serve the country whose resources will increase at the same time as the volume of trade. That will not be easy because the opposite habit has become so entrenched over the past 30 years. This government's first phase was devoted to forging the tool (nationalizations, decentralization, workers' new rights), thanks to which we will be able to direct the new economic and social policy. Well; that tool must, in particular, serve to ease the stranglehold of the costs which are stifling production.

The Moratorium

[Question] In Figeac, Marseilles, you stressed the need to reduce enterprises' costs. You spoke of a "moratorium."

[Answer] The word must be understood in its legal sense. That is the case when you reduce annuities, by spreading them out, when you draw up a schedule for repaying debts or when you reduce interest rates on loans contracted when the cost of money was highest. That will be done in 1983. As for fiscal burdens, the reform of the method for financing family allowances which will be started next spring will be a considerable reform. I know no better remedy to the crisis than enterprises which invest and prosper, provided the national income is more fairly divided.

[Question] Do you not think, for example, that the generalization of the fifth week of paid leave, and the reduction in the working week, were too much of a burden?

[Answer] Certainly. The 39-hour week and the fifth week of paid leave have increased the wage bill. But that addition is not repetitive. Our only responsibility is that we had to meet, in a few months, legitimate popular aspirations which had been repressed for too long.

[Question] Were those exceptional measures appropriate?

[Answer] It was appropriate to begin action to reduce the working week. The employment crisis and, beyond that, my concept of the relationship between work and free time explain that approach.

[Question] Ought not the reduction in the working week to have been accompanied by wage reductions?

[Answer] That would have been necessary for a considerable reduction in hours. It was not necessary for 1 hour in the present situation. Whatever happens, this question will in the future be dealt with in individual enterprises and no reduction will be envisaged for law wages.

[Question] So, you are still convinced that reducing the work week is one of the most effective weapons against unemployment. Swedish Social Democratic Prime Minister Palme has a different opinion.

[Answer] All the workers' trade union organizations in Europe think differently than Olof Palme. At any rate, Palme and I agree that the problem of reducing the work week is linked to the productivity of enterprises.

[Question] You recently reaffirmed your attachment to the European Monetary System [EMS]. Since France belongs to such a system, can it pursue a policy which runs counter to those of its partner? For instance, the FRG's growth prospects for next year are between 0 and 0.5 percent. Can France do better?

[Answer] I believe in the importance of mutual discipline. However, does that mean that because France is a member of the EMS it should align its economic policy with that of its main partners? No, it means that the EMS members must seek fair compromises. Otherwise, the internal tensions will make the system collapse. You are right to stress the difficulty caused by different growth, inflation and foreign trade rates between France and Germany. But there is reason to think that the initial results which we have obtained in our country in the fight against inflation, and the struggle now started against rising unemployment in Germany will prompt our two countries to reconcile their viewpoints.

[Question] Are you betting on recovery in these countries?

[Answer] I observe that Germany has just decided to boost its budget.

Protectionism Will Be Met With Protectionism and a Half

[Question] Germany is our main trade partner. For years our trade deficit with it has been constantly increasing. Does that ultimately threaten the market's survival?

[Answer] Yes. That is why it must be remedied.

[Question] Do our German partners understand that view?

[Answer] I hope so.

[Question] Restoring our foreign trade balance is an absolute necessity. A few weeks ago PCF economist Philippe Herzog wrote in LE MONDE that giving priority to the world market and priority to winning back the domestic market are opposite principles.

[Answer] No, I do not think so. Those two objectives have a point in common which depends on our industry's competitiveness and hence its restructuring. It is necessary for our industry to manufacture for our needs at competitive prices and quality. In doing that it will produce exportable products. In any case, the problem is the same: we must radically renew our industrial facilties and bring them into line with the world's technological needs. The governments which preceeded us succeeded in making progress in two spheres: telecommunications and nuclear power.

A great deal was left for us to do in other spheres. Hence, the plans for textiles, machine tools, iron and steel, electronics, components, automobiles and biogenetics, implemented under Mr Pierre Dreyfus' remarkable guidance, not forgetting major works, the cable networks, the second high speed train, the new airbus -- the list would be a long one.

[Question] However, is it not possible to talk of an increased temptation toward protectionism in France?

[Answer] The temptation of protectionism only exists in France in the form of retaliation. There are a growing number of documents which show protectionist practices being used throughout the world, especially within the EC. I cannot accept that France should suffer from that insidious protectionism. At the next EEC summit in Copenhagen, I will ask for all the cards to be placed on the table and once that has been done, we will know what the position is on free trade and the preferential tariff. Beware of bad habits: Protectionism will be met with protectionism and a half!

[Question] Since we are talking about Europe, Mr President, what is your diagnosis on that patient?

[Answer] I fear that the political need for Europe has now been obscured in the minds of the Europeans. If Europe is sick, it is for lack of awareness. It is not aware of its real strength and potential in the world. The duty of leaders is to restore to it the political will it lacks.

[Question] You dealt with that subject before the elections and even after your election, since you hinted several times that you would make proposals to try to achieve progress.

[Answer] I began by proposing the creation of a real European social space [espace social]. Despite the support of all the big trade unions, virtually no progress has been made on that, even though the struggle against unemployment has become a priority in official Community statements. I then stressed the importance of industrial and technical cooperation. Some progress is in sight. But we will mark time unless we tackle the problem from the top and unless the achievements made are part of an outlook. The Genscher-Colombo report fulfills that requirement, but is limited to petitio principii. This discussion should be resumed. France is prepared for that.

[Question] How do you view Franco-German relations, and do you think that Mr Kohl views them in the same way as Mr Schmidt?

[Answer] The situation is the same.

[Question] We are referring to Germany's monetary support....

[Answer] The EMS rules fix the member countries' obligations. I know ours. I am entitled to expect the will from others to achieve a better balance in our trade.

[Question] As regards European cooperation in industry, in the absence of the possibility of cooperating with states, since the political will to do so does not exist, does France need cooperation with the European multinational firms? I am referring to the specific case of Philips.

[Answer] The government is bound to approve of initiatives like that of Thomson and Grundig (in which Philips has a 25 percent share); that will give shape to industrial Europe.

A Major Danger

[Question] The dollar is constantly rising. At the Versailles summit you tried in vain to persuade the U.S. authorities to help control their currency's rise.

In these circumstances do you think that the reconstruction of a more coherent international system is possible?

[Answer] I do not know whether it is possible, but it is certainly necessary. When I put that necessity to my U.S. visitors, they told me: "It is not us, it is the law of the market." However, our predecessors, who claimed to follow a liberal society, had deemed fit to equip themselves with the Bretton Woods system. The Western world's cohesion cannot be disregarded for too long without damage. It is also world economic development which is at stake and the future of the Third World countries which are being forced into tragic debts for lack of international monetary liquid assets. That subject will be at the center of my talks with Mrs Gandhi in India which I am to visit very shortly. I attach a great deal of importance to this visit. How can anybody fail to be worried by the curb placed on the policies announced in Cancun on energy other than oil from the poor countries, self-sufficiency in food or support for the prices of raw materials. France will not stop warning the industrial world of this major danger. Let us note that it has not made do with talking, since it has not only maintained, but increased its aid.

[Question] The French need to know where they are going. What plan are you presenting to them?

[Answer] Our dialgoue has outlined it. But it is true that the struggle against inflation, against unemployment and for growth, for France's presence on foreign markets and especially on its own, for an international monetary order, for a real European Community, and for a reduction in tension requires what I will call the cultural dimension -- a far-reaching plan. We will succeed in our undertaking if we awaken the nation's creative forces and if we give them a change. Human resources are vast in a country like ours. They will be deployed by education, and by the acquisition and mastery of knowledge. Taste for research, science, technology, knowledge of history, capacity to reflect on the meaning of life, the simple and profound value of the homeland, love of freedom, concern for justice, respect for nature -- the government's every action prompts young people to believe and hope...or to doubt and turn away from what we are doing. I believe young people are strong enough to understand and accept the philosophy of effort, to judge the public authorities on the courage and lucidity they show rather than on the immediate effects of a stringent policy which are often difficult to tolerate. I would like to add that it is large generations which prove to be creative; hence, the importance of a population capable of sustaining great ambitions. I want the barriers limiting the future to be removed everywhere.

MARCHAIS QUIZZED ON POST BREZHNEV CHANGES

[Unattributed report on Radio Monte Carlo interview with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais on 21 November]

[Excerpt] "Are things going to change" in the USSR following Leonid Brezhnev's death and his replacement by Yuriy Andropov?

Georges Marchais said once again that in his view, Yuriy Andropov's statements confirm the Soviets' intention to pursue their course and make progress in several directions. "A new leadership always provides new dynamism," he noted.

With regard to Afghanistan, Georges Marchais continued: "The Pakistani president's presence at Leonid Brezhnev's funeral undoubtedly had a political significance. Afghan Prime Minister [titled as published] Babrak Karmal was also present. I noted that both sides expressed a desire to discuss and to try to find a solution to the conflict. I can tell you what Yuriy Andropov said to me: "If there is a political agreement guaranteeing Afghanistan's independence, and the Afghan people's right to provide itself with the democratic regime of its choice against the feudal lords, and if there is no foreign intervention from Pakistan, the Soviet troops can leave Afghanistan tomorrow."

Turning to Poland and to the "rumors" from U.S. sources which are circulating about Lech Walesa, Georges Marchais pointed out: "American television had announced that 5 million Soviet political prisoners were contructing the gas pipeline. Later it was forced to deny that. I draw the French people's attention to that American method which, unfortunately, there is too much of a tendency to adopt in our country -- namely, that of announcing a false piece of news to exert pressure on public opinion."

In that connection, the PCF secretary general then reported on his personal approach to the Soviet Government, before Leonid Brezhnev's death, to ask for French television to be allowed to go and film a report on the entire Euro-Siberian gas pipeline construction line and the agreement which he obtained from the Soviet Government. "French Television Channel 1 had the opportunity and did not use it."

That is why, Georges Marchais said, returning to Walesa: "I am extremely skeptical about the information being published. Obviously, I know nothing about his private life. I would also like to say that if it unfortunately turned out that there are men in Polish society or in the Polish Communist Party -- and I do not believe there are -- who use such methods to discredit any militant, whoever he might be, including Walesa, I would very vigorously protest.

"But I welcome the fact that Walesa is now free and that discussion is starting. We have won the first phase of the battle -- to prevent civil war. Although nothing has finally been settled, and without wishing to interfere in internal Polish affairs, it is now necessary to resolutely tackle a crisis which is specific to Poland and which stems from serious mistakes in the administration of the economy and failure to observe socialist democracy."

FANFANI TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT 30 NOVEMBER

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 29 -- Amintore Fanfani will go to President Sandro Pertini tomorrow to formally accept the mandate entrusted to him to form Italy's forty-third post-war government.

The new coalition, Fanfani's fifth (his first in twenty years) will partner his own Christian Democrats, the Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals. The Republicans, who had the Prime Ministry in the last two governments headed by Giovanni Spadolini, will not take part in the executive. The Republican Party leadership met today and decided to bow out of Fanfani's coalition and voiced criticism of the platform presented by the premier-designate. The Republicans wanted a tougher economic policy of cutbacks in public spending and lower labor costs.

Despite the Republicans defection, the new coalition can count on a fifty-eight percent majority in Parliament.

This evening Fanfani will chair a meeting of the secretaries of his four government partners. [Words indistinct] (?step) down as Senate speaker before he is officially sworn in as the new prime minister.

The Spadolini government stepped down on November 13. The crisis was triggered by harsh contrasts between the Christian Democrat Treasury Minister Nino Andreatta and Socialist Finance Minister Nino Formica.

The agreement over Fanfani's program was reached Saturday in a meeting between the premier-designate and the secretaries of the outgoing majority. The platform, originally judged positively by the Republicans, underwent some modifications by the Socialists and Social Democrats who had considered it too draconian.

Parties', Unions' Reactions

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 30 -- Italy's government crisis comes to an end today when Amintore Fanfani goes to President Sandro Pertini to formally present his cabinet. It will be Italy's 43d postwar government and the fifth headed by Fanfani. The new administration is a four-way coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals. The Republicans are waiting to verify the planks in Fanfani's program before they decide whether or not to give the government outside support.

At a meeting of top union leaders Monday the CGIL-CISL and UIL Federation softened its opposition to a first draft of Fanfani's program (released on November 24), after a perusal of a second draft issued on November 27, following a meeting the premier-designate had with the secretaries of the four parties in his new coalition government.

Lidia Menapace, speaking for the extreme leftwing party, PDUP, said that despite these modifications, the program was clearly rightwing and anti-popular.

Radical Party Leader Marco Pannella claimed that the program denied Christian values and would be a force for destabilization.

The DC daily POPOLO defended Fanfani's program which seeks to contain the public deficit and the cost of labor. Editor-in-chief Giovanni Galloni said that no one could expect these measures to be painless but that they were essential if job levels were to be safeguarded and if there was to be any resumption of the country's development.

The Liberal Party leadership, meeting last night, issued a brief communique exhorting the government to firmly maintain the Atlantic alliance line and the consequent decisions with regard to European security (Euromissiles).

Political observers expected Fanfani to present his program to the Parliament this very week.

BULGARIAN EMBASSY AGAIN PROTESTS ANTONOV ARREST

AU300834 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 30 -- The Bulgarian Embassy in Italy has once again protested against the arrest of Bulgarian citizen Sergei Ivanov Antonov, accused by Italian officials of complicity in the attempt to assassinate Pope John Paul II last year.

The embassy also claimed that no charges had been leveled against (Teodorov Aivazov), an employee at the embassy implicated in the attack on the pope.

The embassy said Monday night that it would take the case to the Tribunal of Liberty and call for the liberation of Antonov, arrested last week in Rome where he worked as an official for the Bulgarian airline. The Tribunal of Liberty is a recently created body which probes the grounds for incarceration prior to trial.

The Turkish daily GUNES Monday claimed that (Aivazov) had taken part in a meeting Antonov had with Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turkish terrorist convicted in Italy of shooting the pope on May 13, 1981.

PLO LEADER 'ARAFAT INTERVIEWED BY ROME PAPER

AU251537 Rome ANSA in English 1527 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 25 -- In an interview to Rome's "MESSAGGERO" today, Palestinian Liberation Organization leader Yasir 'Arafat said that the Italians were the first people in the Western world "to ally themselves at our side".

He said that during his September visit to Rome he was able to take stock personally of the solidarity of the Italian people for his own. It was clear to him that this solidarity was real, heartfelt and spontaneous on the part of everyone, he said.

The PLO chief also thanked Italy for the stance it took after the Palestinian evacuation of Beirut and for its protest over the massacres of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps.

He then turned to the battle of Beirut, accusing Israel of having used his people as guinea pigs for the experimentation of highly-sophisticated weapons. He claimed that the Americans had actually congratulated the Israelis for conducting these experiments.

"Israel is the only state in the world created by the United Nations and nevertheless it does not recognize, or rather violates, its resolutions," he said. The Palestinians are ready, on the other hand, to accept all of the UN's decisions, he continued.

Turning to the role Italy can play, 'Arafat said that the country had a moral and historic responsibility to help settle the Palestinian problem. He concluded his remarks with a quip: "When we were occupied by the Romans, we sent a fisherman named Peter to Italy. It seems that this fisherman is still creating problems for you today".

PLO REPRESENTATIVE SEES NO DEBATE ON ISRAEL

AU251424 Rome ANSA in English 0838 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 25 -- Recognition of Israel will most likely not even be debated when the Palestinian National Council meets in Damascus today according to the PLO representative in Italy, Nimr Haddad. Haddad last night said Israel's refusal to take part in any type of negotiation and the lack of any U.S. or European political moves at this point in the Middle East situation threatened to worsen problems in the region.

He renewed an appeal for the immediate recognition of the PLO by the Italian Government.

PLO LEADER DISAVOWS USE OF TERRORIST METHODS

AU251923 Rome ANSA in English 1914 GMT 25 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 25 -- Palestine Liberation Organization policy does not include the use of military acts against Israeli civilians in Israel, the PLO vice president, Abu Iyad, said in Rome today in a statement in which he called for international cooperation with the PLO to "arrive at the truth" on terrorism.

The PLO official stopped over in the Italian capital on a flight from Tunis to Belgrade where he will conduct a visit on the invitation of the Yugoslav president for talks on the Arab Mideast peace plan. Iyad reported that, "my trip fits in the framework of a series of contacts the PLO will make with European countries before next month's Palestinian National Council meeting.

"As regards alleged relations between our organization and international terrorism", the PLO official said, "after Beirut, we are even more determined to condemn any acts of this type. Our policy, internal and external, does not involve any military acts against Israeli civilians in Israel. We call upon Italy and the other European nations in which the phenomenon of terrorism exists to open, along with us, an international investigation to arrive at the truth together. For our part, we are always ready and willing for any initiative in this direction".

Speaking about his visit to Yugoslavia, Abu Iyad said, "In these three days, I will meet the president of the republic and the ministers for foreign affairs and information for an analysis of the latest developments in the Palestinian problem and international issues".

PCI APPROVES, RELEASES CONGRESS DOCUMENT

AU272020 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, November 27 -- (?By) a large majority, the Italian Communist Party Central Committee approved Friday a program document of the next party congress to be held in Milan March 2-6.

The document confirms the judgement that "the propulsive force of the historic experience of Soviet socialism has "worn itself out". It points to the "democratic alternative" to power wielded by the Christian Democrat Party as the only political direction in Italy and spells out the new line for developing socialism drafted by the Communist Party.

The document, released here today, presents an analysis of "the lurking dangers of war" in the world in this moment of "virtual passage of an era".

With respect to Italian politics, the PCI urges the unity of the left "as an alternative to the Christian Democrats and its power system", based on a paralyzing welfare state.

The Communist Party Central Committee document reiterated the party's critical position on the situation in Afghanistan and Poland.

FUTURE FOREIGN MINISTER ON FRANCE, U.S. NATO

LD292154 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] The man who will be the next foreign minister, diplomat Fernando Moran, has been speaking to EFE about his priorities: We shall be giving fresh impetus, Fernando Moran says, to our relations with France. We have to attain an overall relationship with that country, and to that end we shall create a large embassy in Paris and put somebody of high standing in charge of it.

He also says: We accept the agreements with the United States but they need to be corrected, and in some instances, readjusted.

On the question of NATO Fernando Moran speaks in terms similar to those used earlier by Felipe Gonzalez. He says that the PSOE is not anti-NATO but that it will be asking for a freeze on the integration of Spain into the military organization.

Further Comments on NATO

LD291958 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1900 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Speaking to the Belgian press, the future Spanish foreign minister, Fernando Moran, has said that he does not favor a referendum on NATO being held immediately.

Contrary to the opinion among the PSOE leadership, future Foreign Minister Fernando Moran does not favor a referendum being held soon on whether Spain is to remain in NATO. In an exclusive interview given to the Belgian paper LA LIBRE BELGIQUE the Socialist diplomat says that the first thing to do is what the outgoing government did not do, namely, analyze the needs of our national defense and evaluate whether NATO is capable of meeting or responding to these needs. The conclusions will then have to be put to the people through a public debate, and therefore, in the view of Fernando Moran, it would be a mistake to fix the date of such a referendum now. Observers believe that a referendum in Spain on NATO will not be held until the Socialists have been in power at least 2 years.

The man who will soon be in charge of Spanish foreign policy says that Spain will be neither neutral nor nonaligned. We belong to the Western world, Moran says, and we have to acknowledge the obligations contracted by the previous government. So, we are a member of NATO, but we shall freeze the negotiations for integration into the military organization of the Atlantic alliance. The future foreign minister told a LA LIBRE BELGIQUE correspondent that Spain wants to retain adequate freedom of action within the Western system so as not to become a satellite. Fernando Moran added that although there is no single country which offers a model for us, the aspirations held by General de Gaulle is an interesting example. By this he means the aspiration to harmonize France's national interests with those of the Western system.

DPA CITES GONZALEZ ON NATO, EC POLICIES

[Text] Hamburg, 29 Nov (DPA) -- Spain's new head of government, Felipe Gonzalez, intends to "stop for the time being" his country's integration into NATO "in order to look into all aspects of that decision, which is so important for our country." In an interview with the Hamburg magazine DER STERN, to be published in the next edition (of next Thursday) Gonzalez also said that Spain would not forget that it belongs to the Western world and thus has a duty toward the West's defense.

Concerning Spain's entry into the European Community, the Socialist head of government emphasized that those EC countries that advocate Spain's admission have not mustered sufficient political will to overcome economic doubts about the integration. "Bonn also has reservations, which are, however, not openly voiced. The fear is that Bonn might be asked to contribute even more to the EC budget," Gonzalez said. On no account is Spain prepared to renounce its claim to Gibraltar, said Gonzalez, in reference to British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's intention to agree to Spain's admission to the EC only if Spain shows good conduct in the dispute surrounding the British colony of Gibraltar.

Gonzalez announced a reform of his country's Armed Forces. Asked whether his government will bow to the Army's proposals regarding assignments to top military positions, he said: "We shall not renounce any legitimate authority given to us by the people. In any case, the qualifications for the Civil Defense Ministry, founded not all that long ago, remain to be developed. We intend to reform the Armed Forces, but strictly according to the guidelines of the Constitution, not according to party political viewpoints."

An edited version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

APN VIEW OF SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC TRENDS CRITICIZED

PM251131 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 23 Nov 82 p 8

[Editorial: "The Future"]

[Text] A correspondent of the Soviet APN news agency in Copenhagen, Aleksandr Polyukhov, wrote an article in AKTUELT [22 November] on the future of the Nordic Social Democratic parties. The article is interesting reading, because it is not only revealing about Soviet propaganda, but also about Soviet thinking. First, the article elegantly ignores the most obvious facts, and, second, developments which are an expression of independent Nordic thinking are overinterpreted, but in the same breath, conclusions are drawn on typically Soviet premises. The article stated, for example, that the Nordic Social Democratic Parties have ignored the Communists as a political force and attempted to isolate them.

All those who are not Russian can see the situation as it is: In southern Europe Eurocommunism arose in opposition to orthodox Russian communism. In Poland, the Solidarity free trade union arose as a protest against the state party-directed trade union movement. In the Nordic countries, Moscow communism disappears of its own accord. It is not being isolated; it simply dies.

In Denmark, this happened through schisms and the formation of new parties because the old Communist Party had no strength. Mr Polyukhov does not understand this because his thinking is based strictly on peculiar Russian premises.

MISINFORMATION CAUSE FOR SJAASTAD TO RESIGN

PM241559 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 20 Nov 82 p 4

[Editorial: "Sjaastad Must Resign"]

[Text] Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad must resign. This is the only natural course of action now that the defense minister has attempted to undermind confidence in the Storting and the Storting Defense Committee through the columns of DAGBLADET. If the Storting attaches any importance at all to its own self-respect -- and this is important for our entire political system -- Defense Minister Sjaastad himself must be met with a vote of no confidence in the defense debate next Monday [22 November]. The relationship between the Storting and the defense minister in the present case has nothing to do with the so-called missile affair. It concerns our Constitution itself, the relationship between the Storting and the government. But it also concerns something more -- the esteem in which politics are held and respect for the politicians in a democracy such as ours.

The situation which Defense Minister Sjaastad has created can be hidden behind a smokescreen of many fine, difficult to comprehend verbiage, and it is clear that a few individuals are busy with such an operation. However, the whole thing can be explained fairly simply. When the Storting debated our economic ties with NATO on 8 June, it was clear that Norway's share of the expenses for the possible deployment of medium-range missiles would be 49 million kroner. In a statement from a unanimous Defense Committee, it was said that "up to now, Norway has not had to pay any part of this amount." However, it later emerged that this was not in line with the facts. The Norwegian NATO account has already paid out a certain sum toward preparations for missile deployment.

In a controversial interview with DAGBLADET yesterday, Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad said that the Storting Defense Committee knew about this before its statement was written. In other words, the defense minister was claiming that against their better judgement, the Defense Committee's members signed a statement which contained incorrect information. And note, information which was central to the Storting debate on these issues.

We do not put much faith in the defense minister's version. At any rate, he failed to make a clear statement on these issues to the committee. The Labor Party's spokesman on the issue, Olaf Oen, told the Storting yesterday that the minister was asked several times by the committee whether Norway had paid any of the costs involved. The minister told the committee that this was not the case, and it was this denial which formed the basis for the words which were finally included in the statement.

The defense minister's claims that the Defense Committee consciously gave the Storting incorrect information are so serious that we hope that the Storting president will soon take up the Socialist Left Party's call for an investigation of what happened. The defense minister's statements already amount to a major contribution to bringing the whole Storting and our parliamentary system into discredit.

If we accept the defense minister's assertion that he gave the Defense Committee all the information pertaining to the issue, the fact remains that on 8 June he took part in a Storting debate on false premises. He knew that important information in the statement was incorrect and he knew that a number of the people who spoke in the debate did so in the belief that what was contained in the statement was correct. Nevertheless, the minister did not intervene to state what was correct. He must obviously have taken the view that it was right for the Storting's work to be conducted under false premises. In other words, the minister must have a pretty sordid impression of Norwegian political life at the Storting level.

It would be incomprehensible if the Storting were to allow something like this to pass. The rescue attempts from nonsocialist circles made in the Storting yesterday were some of the most pathetic actions ever taken in Lovebakken [location of Storting]. We repeat: There is only one natural course of action in the present situation -- the defense minister must go.

Labor Party Stand Scored

[Editorial]

[Text] The proposed vote of no confidence in Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad was only one of the many diversionary tactics the Labor Party tried yesterday in the Storting debate on the missile affair. It was an embarrassing and -- for the Storting -- a most unworthy spectacle, for no one could have any doubts about the intentions. By criticizing the defense minister for providing insufficient information, despite the fact that the minister had demonstrated an openness which was too much of a good thing even for the Labor Party, Gro Harlem Brundtland and her party hoped to cover up the political realities of the affair.

As everyone now knows, the Harlem Brundtland government had committed Norway to taking part in financing the preparatory work in connection with the possible future deployment of medium-range missiles. The Labor Party is no longer willing to admit this because of growing foreign policy opposition from the party's left wing and because it is said that public opinion on the deployment of nuclear missiles in the West has changed. From beginning to end, therefore, yesterday's Labor Party debate strategy was a single concerted attempt to throw a smokescreen over the party's flight from the real contents of the dual decision and the commitments the party itself had made.

The outcome of this change of attitude by the Labor Party was that for the first time since World War II, the Storting was split down the middle on an issue of fundamental significance on security policy.

Through its vote yesterday the Labor Party has assumed a weighty responsibility, not only because the party has deliberately helped to disrupt national unity on defense and security policy, but also because of the extremely serious consequences it could have in the future. By moving away from our commitments under the dual decision, the Labor Party has also helped to undermine the West's negotiating strategy toward the Soviet Union aimed at reaching an agreement on mutually balanced nuclear disarmament in Europe.

The aim of NATO's dual decision of 12 December 1979 is quite simply to make the deployment of new nuclear arms in the West superfluous. Not a single missile will be deployed in the West if the Soviet Union is willing to make reductions in its force of SS-20 missiles trained on Western Europe. Up to now, the Soviet Union has been unwilling to agree to such a solution. However, because of the compliant approach now being demonstrated by the Labor Party and other Social Democratic parties in Western Europe, there is a growing danger that the Soviet Union will find no reason for reaching an agreement because it could possibly escape deployment in the West without making any concessions at all. In other words, the result could be that the Soviet Union could further increase its military superiority, something which once again could tempt it into a policy of blackmail and consequently trigger off a big catastrophe.

We must be permitted to ask: Does the Labor Party seriously think that yielding to the Soviet Union is likely to promote disarmament and peace? We thought that the party had learned its lesson from the self-sacrificing policy of illusion in the period leading up to 9 April 1940 [German World War II invasion or Norway].

COMPROMISE FOR DEFENSE BUDGET AFTER DEVALUATION

LD292010 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Excerpt] The Armed Forces have to cut 200 million kroner per annum through 1987. This is the content of the compromise reached between economy and Budget Minister Kjell-Olof Feldt and Defense Minister Borje Andersson. The total defense budget will amount to between 18-19 billion kronor per annum. If devaluation had been allowed to have its full effect on the defense allocations, the cuts would have been 800 million kronor per annum. However, the Armed Forces will receive 75 percent compensation for devaluation, and need save only 200 million kronor per annum through 1987. This is the result of an agreement within the government today. All sections of the total defense will be affected by the annual savings, but it is still unclear how the savings are to be made. According to information received by our staff, refresher training will hardly be affected, nor will the so-called JAS [planned interceptor-fighter-reconnaissance] aircraft. Much of the weapons and otherwar materiel for the Swedish Armed Forces is imported. Consequently, devaluation hits defense hard.

The savings are to be made across the board, thus affecting all sectors of the total defense. However, there are reports -- which our staff are unable to confirm -- that the Navy will not be affected. In other words, the planned improvements for hunting submarines will be allowed to continue. According to sources within the Armed Forces, the government and the Armed Forces leadership will not, however, allow the cuts to affect refresher training. Instead, some maintenance, for example of buildings and older equipment, will be postponed The gigantic JAS project, the new fighter aircraft, will not be affected.

The Armed Forces budget at present is between 18-19 billion kronor per annum, but the leadership of the Armed Forces thinks that the savings which must now be made will hit the Armed Forces hard. Commodore Claes Tornberg of the Swedish Naval staff says, for example, that it will now be necessary to plan at a level which is 700 million kronor less per annum than the planning carried out as late as last year. However, he holds the view that last year's defense decision still applies.

SCOPE FOR USSR ECONOMIC REFORM SEEN AS LIMITED

[Editorial: "Andropov's Recipe"]

[Text] Of the little made public from the session of the Supreme Soviet in the Kremlin, it is notable that party leader Yuriy Andropov was unanimously elected a member of the Presidium of the Soviet Parliament. In itself, this does not mean that he has achieved yet another position of power, but it could mean the first step toward Andropov's elevation to Presidium chairman, that is, his election as Soviet president and head of state. If he were to be given this post as well, it would be a new record for the former KGB chief. It took Leonid Brezhnev 13 years after he succeeded Khrushchev as party leader to unite these two posts. The rapidity with which Andropov was elected party boss by the Central Committee came as a surprise to Western observers. Most of them had been expecting a protracted struggle for power, and in many circles, Andropov was seen as an interim leader.

Even if during the current session of the Supreme Soviet Andropov is also appointed head of state this need not be a sure sign that he has concentrated all power in his hands. But the way in which he got to grips with the Soviet Union's economic stagnation and dogmatic paralysis in his speech on Monday are an indication that he considers himself powerful. The fact that instead of repeating slogans he called for reforms and personal initiatives, less waste and new ideas, throws important light on the background to the superpower noises in the foreign policy section of his address. Once again we saw a reflection of the Soviet Union's economic problems. Promises of more consumer goods have been made before and degenerate features in the strict central control of the economy have also been attacked in the past, by Brezhnev in particular.

Andropov, even though he says that he has no recipe for how the problems are to be solved, goes further than previous leaders in his calls for reorganization and throws his weight behind the idea of giving larger industrial and agricultural enterprises greater independence. The fact that he is even saying that it might be necessary to look at "our brother nations' experiences" shows a remarkable openness which will be noted by the countries of Eastern Europe in particular, where it has long been clear that the strict application of a dogmatic Soviet system does not work. The weak economic growth rate, the shortage of consumer products and foodstuffs and technological backwardness show that it has not worked in the Soviet Union either.

Sacrosanct slogans have for too long been allowed to determine working conditions. However, Andropov's opportunities to act as a reformer are limited. The communist system could possibly be corrected in Eastern Europe's communist nations with economies that are limited in size and easily surveyed in comparison with the Soviet economy. Though reform of the Soviet economy is not possible, in the past, Soviet economists have launched theories for significant decentralization. The fact that they are now being raised by Andropov must not be interpreted as a flirtation with capitalism. What Andropov is seeking is the perfection of the planned economy. His problem is that this is incompatible with the desire for enterprise and private initiatives.

FRG OFFICIAL DISCUSSES ROLE OF TURKISH ARMY

TA30G851 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0825 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Lefkose, 30 Nov (AA) -- Prof Dr Kondrad Schon, Federal German Christian Democrat Party deputy, who is also a member of the European Parliament, said Sunday at the end of a visit to Cyprus the Turkish Army was on the island to assure the safety of the Turkish Cypriot community. "I am convinced that the rights of the Turkish people in northern Cyprus are secure and that you are living freely. The Greek Cypriot economic embargo imposed on the North is not compatible with human rights since the Turkish Cypriot community has no intention to attack the South," he added.

Schon, a constitutional expert, said the federal system to be elaborated in the island should comprise federated states of equal political status regardless of their territories and their populations.

GOVERNMENT URGED TO SUSPEND INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

NC270829 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 27 Nov 82 p 1

[From "My Opinion" column by "The Observer": "Now It Is Accountable -- Partition Is Concluded at the Time of the Consortium Without the Latter Reacting to It"]

[Excerpts] Our occupied areas have been politically, militarily and financially integrated into the Turkish state. They have been incorporated within the Turkish state. This is a fait accompli and a tragedy that marks the beginning of fresh sufferings for the Cypriot people. Politically, Ankara has enforced its will on the Turkish Cypriot community through a puppet regime headed by Denktas and Catagay.

From the military point of view, Ankara -- through its occupation forces in the occupied areas -- has integrated northern Cyprus in its defense plans and converted it into a military base.

From the financial point of view, Ankara has been maintaining the Turkish Cypriots and has made the occupied part financially dependent upon it. The establishment of a "central bank," the introduction of the Turkish lira, the tourist unification of northern Cyprus with southern Turkey, and many other actions constitute clear proof of the inclusion of northern Cyprus in the Turkish economy.

This is our tragedy today. Cyprus has not been merely partitioned. Something worse has happened to it. The northern part of Cyprus has been incorporated by means of a series of faits accomplis within Turkey; it has become Turkey's protectorate.

The destruction appears to have been concluded but, unfortunately, the leadership and the consortium are not aware of what is going on. They have not activated themselves, and they are unable to proceed even with the most fundamental kind of reaction.

We had demanded the consortium change its stand, course and policy in the past, but it insisted on its catastrophic line. Now it bears full responsibility. During its time, and without any actual reaction from it: The Turks have financially incorporated the northern part of Cyprus within Turkey. They have established a "central bank," they have officially introduced the Turkish currency; they have issued deeds of ownership for Greek Cypriot property; they have unified the tourism of the occupied areas with that of southern Turkey; they have dissociated themselves from the priority question of Famagusta; they have carried out projects that give their pseudostate the status of a state; and they have freed themselves from all international pressure.

Instead of saving us, the minimum program has helped the Turks. Six months after its birth, it has helped Ankara and Denktas to proceed rapidly with their plans without any fundamental reaction. Six months of minimum program have been enough to destroy unity, to blow up the front between Greece and Cyprus and to assist in the conclusion of partition.

What will happen if this regrettable program and this regrettable policy are continued for another 5 years? What would be left to save?

We call upon the government to announce that it is not going to send the interlocutor to the Ledra Palace if the recent Turkish decisions are not suspended.

The consortium is now given a unique opportunity to stop the travesty. No foreigner will blame it. On the contrary, it is the Turkish side that will find itself exposed. The consortium must declare that with its actions and decisions the Turkish side has deviated from the basis that is laid down by the UN resolutions and the summit agreements for the holding of the intercommunal talks.

These resolutions and these agreements clearly stress that the intercommunal dialogue must have as a goal the finding of a federal solution. Moreover, the summit agreements rule out annexation or union of part of Cyprus with another country.

However, the Turkish actions prove that there has been violation of agreements and that they are outside the spirit and the substance of what has been agreed. The Turks are not working for a federal solution. They are promoting the annexation of part of the Cyprus Republic by a foreign country.

Therefore, the withdrawal of the Greek Cypriot side from the travesty would be fully justified as well as fully documented.

But apart from this, it will compel the various third party quarters, who remain inactive with the excuse that talks are taking place, to wake up and to undertake efforts to push the problem toward a solution.

Along with this, the government must back the Greek Government's international campaign for the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops, the establishment of a peace force and the commencement of talks. Internally it must:

1. Cancel the minimum program
2. Seek the charting of a national program as suggested by Mr Y. Ioannidhis
3. Promote people's reconciliation as proposed by Mr V. Lissaridhis
4. Prepare the ground for the convocation of a national conference in accordance with Mr Kliridhis' suggestion.

Only by taking these measures will the consortium be able to lessen its heavy responsibilities as a result of its unseemly behavior and terrible mistakes, which have brought us closer to catastrophe. If Mr Spiros Kiprianou and AKEL again decline to proceed with decisive actions in order to deal with the Turkish separatist efforts, they will also be shouldering the responsibilities for any fresh national catastrophe that may occur.

KIPRIANOU STATEMENT ON PALESTINE SOLIDARITY DAY

NC292051 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou reaffirmed that the solidarity of the government and of all the Cypriot people with the struggling brotherly Palestinian people will continue until the final vindication of their struggle.

In a statement on the occasion of today's international day of solidarity with the Palestinian people, Kiprianou stressed that the abhorrent acts of terror, the atrocities and the cruel crime of the Palestinian people's genocide constitute a stigma for humanity and its civilization. President Kiprianou added: From within the ruins and the slaughter, the Palestinian people proudly rose to the challenge and displayed bravery and virtue. Their courage and determination, President Kiprianou added, to walk the road of fulfillment of their inalienable rights by paying the high price of sacrifice in their struggle for the withdrawal of foreign troops from the occupied Palestinian lands, the restoration of the Palestinian refugees to their properties and homes, and above all the right to freedom and a peaceful life in an independent and soverign state, remind us of our people's similar cruel fate. The Cypriot people, Kiprianou mentioned, who are also the victims of a heinous invader who illegally tramples upon their inalienable rights by occupying a large part of their fatherland, feel great sympathy for the suffering Palestinian people and offer them brotherly solidarity and support. The Cypriot Government and PLO, concluded the president of the republic, are developing their relations in a spirit of friendship and cooperation which springs from the feelings of understanding for the just struggle of their peoples.

On the occasion of the international day of solidarity for the Palestinian people, the president of the republic sent messages to PLO leader 'Arafat and UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar.

Specifically, the following instructions have been given:

1. The arbitration decision determining the wages of the Greek staff on the bases must be implemented and the dues paid at Greek public expense.
2. The issue of the association's chairman should be settled from both the financial and the settlement of labor relations viewpoints.
3. The stipulations of the other (?labor laws) providing for the unimpeded exercise of the working people's trade union rights must also be implemented and every foreigner working at the bases without the necessary legal work permit must be removed.

ENERGY MINISTER ON SOVIET GAS, NUCLEAR PLANTS

NC261555 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 26 Nov 82 p 4

[Excerpt] Greece is still a long way from a final decision on whether to buy natural gas from the Soviet Union through the Romanian and Bulgarian section of the pipeline supplying these two Balkan countries.

Answering a question on the subject, Energy and Natural Resources Minister Evangelos Kouloumbis told a foreign press association conference that discussions concerning the pipeline "are at the very early stages. Much study will still be needed, particularly in relation to the cost and use of the excess capacity of the Romanian and Bulgarian pipeline."

Kouloumbis ruled out the establishment of nuclear power stations in Greece for this decade and said that the earthquake risk made the setting up of such stations prohibitive for the time being.

"This is the reason why they have not been included either in the government's five-year energy plan starting next year nor in the ten-year one."

Reviewing the government's energy policy, Mr Kouloumbis said that there were three fundamental dimensions of the Greek energy problem:

1) The great dependence on imported energy.
2) The large expenditure in foreign currency.
3) The low efficiency of the energy sector.

KKE-INTERIOR ISSUES CENTRAL COMMITTEE RESOLUTION

NC291319 Athens I AVYI in Greek 28 Nov 82 p 1

[Report on resolution adopted at the KKE-Interior Central Committee meeting 19-23 November]

[Text] The government practice until now, and the directions it expresses, do not lead to a positive overcoming of the crisis. Therefore, deep changes in the government's concepts are necessary so that Greek society may advance toward progress -- "the country's political and social life needs to be infused with new elements." This is stressed in the resolution of the KKE-Interior Central Committee released yesterday. The resolution covers the recent political developments (including the municipal elections), problems of economic construction and the party's duties during the present phase.

In realizing the deep changes, the resolution gives particular emphasis to the substantive role of the people, and within this framework, the popularization of the KKE-Interior concepts, as well as the leading participation of the communists of rejuvenation, "in the battle for the necessary adjustments," acquire vital importance.

Referring to the new election and post-election period, the resolution points out that the rightwing policy "tends -- with the encouragement of foreign circles -- toward destabilization and the blocking of the democratic course," while on the other hand, "the strengthening of the dogmatic Communist Party [KKE] and its policy constitutes an element that could have a negative effect in the democratic evolution."

In order to realize substantive changes in government policy and for the cause of change to acquire a new impetus -- the resolution stresses -- the people's struggles should be oriented toward:

-- The promotion of a firm policy of independence and peace.
-- The protection of the working people's interests.
-- The establishment of substantive forms of the working people's participation.
-- The development of democracy and the surmounting of the one-party mentality of PASOK.

The resolution also stresses that, with the promotion of the change as its goal, the party must utilize all its strength within the framework of its general policy as charted by the third congress -- a policy of which the basic element is the autonomous projection of the KKE-Interior positions.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON MEMORANDUM SIGNED WITH U.S.

TA300617 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] A memorandum of understanding has been signed in Brussels on the joint use of both the Turkish and U.S. Air Force of certain Turkish airfields within the framework of NATO. Turkish Radio and Television correspondents report that the memorandum was signed today by the deputy chief of the General Staff, Gen Necdet Oztorun, and Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle following the NATO European group meeting held in Brussels.

The memorandum was initialed in Ankara in October. A statement on this subject says that the memorandum includes arrangements that will allow, in accordance with NATO plans, the timely transfer of U.S. reinforcement units to Turkey in a bid to deter armed aggression or to divert a war that might break out, to the advantage of the alliance at its initial stages. The statement recalls that similar documents have been signed in the past between the United States and other NATO countries.

In a statement following the document signing, National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken explained that the agreement envisaged the modernization of Turkish airfields in order to allow the transfer of reinforcement aircraft or troops. Bayulken added that this was not a new development, and that the work on modernization of Turkish airfields dated back to 1952. Bayulken said that the necessary financing for this would be made from NATO's Asia fund, and that a U.S. contribution to this fund was expected in case of need.

MILLIYET DISCUSSES RDF USE OF MILITARY BASES

NC240946 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 19 Nov 82 p 7

["Corner" column by Mehmet Ali Birand: "Secrecy and Frankness"]

[Text] The U.S.-Turkish agreement, details of which are about to be completed, should not be kept secret, because the more it is concealed, the more it will lead to adverse comment and unnecessary speculation. One thing was confirmed in a recent statement U.S. Ambassador Strausz-Hupe made to the DAILY NEWS. He said that depots will be constructed on the bases to be modernized. We knew this was going to happen and we even wrote about it. But the authorities did not want to comment on this matter at all. Now, willy nilly, people are asking these questions: How much ammunition will be stored in these depots? Will fuel also be stored in these depots? How many U.S. aircraft will be based there? Under what conditions will these bases be used? Is it "the deployment force" which will protect the region within NATO or will it also be used -- in the scenario frequently repeated by U.S. officials -- to counter a Soviet intervention in the Persian Gulf or Iran or to prevent disturbances in one of the pro-Western Gulf states?

Another point came to light in the course of an interview Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen granted to MILLIYET last week. In this interview, Turkmen said Turkey is not at all committed to the Rapid Deployment Force (RDF). But when the need arises, "the RDF could use not only the new bases but the old ones as well." It is important for us to know what "when the need arises" means. Moreover, the issue of constructing a new base in Mus is gradually coming to the fore.... There is a military installation in Mus, but in the Americans' eyes it is so small and inadequate (like the other two) that it cannot even be called an installation, let alone a base. That is why, according to Washington, "a new base will be built in Mus," while Ankara says "no new base will be built but the old ones will be modernized."

What is the use of playing hide-and-seek or acting mysteriously as in detective fiction? The WASHINGTON POST, one of the most truthful newspapers of the United States, has published not one but three consecutive reports and commentaries maintaining that "the United States has increased military aid to Turkey and that bases are being prepared for the RDF." The WASHINGTON POST can err once, but it would not persist in repeating the same reports without having had them verified by the Pentagon or the State Department.

In their briefings in Europe, U.S. officials do not talk easily of their RDF preparations in Turkey.

Rumors and discussions over the defense cooperation agreement have reached such a stage that failure to disclose it after the details have been completed and the agreement signed will further increase doubt and speculation that could lead to deviation from the aims of the agreement. Another point that should not be forgotten is that in the months or years ahead we shall unavoidably see the details of the agreement either in a report to Congress on in a U.S. newspaper.

Keeping this agreement secret at a time when Turkey's influence in the Middle East is beginning to increase and when a leader like King Husayn -- who has become "a key figure -- comes to Ankara to obtain views, is a factor that could adversly affect the other regional countries' views about Turkey. It would be far more useful that they clearly know whether Turkey is being given a new role and if it is, what this role is.

Moreover, wouldn't continuing this secrecy -- which signifies a deep fear of the RDF -- entail far more negative consequences when the RDF actually comes? We all know quite well that when the need arises, the RDF will come to Turkey whether Turkey objects or not. Therefore, it should be openly discussed now. The government's attitude would be more readily accepted if the government secured the support of the people -- whether this attitude is negative or positive. But this cannot be done through secrecy.

[A footnote to the column reads] if anyone thinks this secrecy is necessary with regard to the Soviet Union, he is mistaken. Because Moscow is in a position to learn far ahead of us what is being done and where.

MINISTER REPORTS PROGRESS ON F-16, F-18 DEAL

TA241748 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Nov 82

EVREN WARNS AGAINST EARLY POLITICAL ACTIVITY

TA300710 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] President Kenan Evren has said that all legislation envisaged in the Constitution, and foremost the laws on political parties and elections, would be ready no later than in a year. In his statements in certain eastern Black Sea districts, on his way back to Ankara, the president recalled that the Constitution articles concerning political activities were not in effect yet. Pointing out that certain people had already begun conducting political activities claiming the inheritance of now dissolved political parties, Evren said that such activities were illegal.

The president recalled the fact that the Constitution was overwhelmingly adopted with their votes, and called on the citizens to do the same during the coming elections. Pointing out that those with bad faith would not neglect to cast their votes, Evren said that citizens with good faith had to go to the polls in order to reduce the others to a minority.

Additional Evren Remarks

[Text] Hopa, Artvin, 30 Nov (AA) -- President Kenan Evren who spent the night in Artvin, the northeasternmost province of Turkey, told a gathering in Hopa Monday: "The fight against bribe-taking has not yet proved as successful as the fight against terror and anarchy." Bribery can be prevented when bribe takers are caught red-handed by warnings to authorities from would-be bribe givers, he said, adding that not only Turkey but other countries too, no matter how strict their regimes are, failed to eradicate bribery.

Calling on teachers and parents to raise their children as persons full of virtue, morality, determination and yearning to serve the country, the president said: "In case one is not raised as a person who loves his country and nation, the scientific knowledge is not sufficient for him. Today's youths will be tomorrow's statesmen."

The duty falls primarily on families and secondarily on teachers to raise youths as persons who respect their elders and love those younger than themselves.

Next year, a new law would be introduced to impose compulsory service in eastern provinces for members of various professions similar to the one for doctors, he announced, "so that no countries will be left anymore without engineers, veterinarians and doctors. We will legislate that law even if we are faced with opposition."

FINANCE MINISTER ADDRESSES CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY

[Excerpt] The Consultative Assembly convened today at 0900 to resume its debate on the 1983 fiscal budget bill. The assembly is expected to vote on the bill today and conclude its discussions on the subject. The Finance Ministry budget as well as the overall revenue budget were adopted and the government employees salary coefficient was increased to 35.

In answer to criticism of his ministry's budget, Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu said it would be the assembly's decision as to whether the salary coefficient of government employees stays at 34 or is increased to 35. Pointing out that without an efficient supervision of the revenue taxes it would be impossible to make the necessary investment in the public sector or to raise the salary of employees in the public sector, Kafaoglu said that reforms would soon be made in the ministry's revenue tax offices.

He added that various amendments in connection with financial laws were being prepared, adding that new regulations to rearrange the activities of commercial banks were also being considered. Kafaoglu concluded by saying that the state debts to farmers would be paid as soon as possible. After the budget of the Finance Ministry was passed, a vote was taken on the articles of the budget bill.

COMMERCE MINISTER NOTES ECONOMIC PROGRESS

TA231732 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Nov 82

[Excerpt] The Commerce Ministry and Housing and Reconstruction Ministry's budgets were approved today at the Consultative Assembly. In a statement at the general assembly, Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk said that the Turkish economy has reached a point which permits confidence in the future. Canturk recalled that great strides were taken in increasing exports and that the problem of insufficient foreign exchange was mostly solved. The commerce minister said that the gap between imports and exports, which was $3.5 billion during the first 9 months of 1981, was reduced to $2.3 billion during the same period in 1982. He added that this development marks an important stage in the promotion of the Turkish economy. Canturk said that the inflation rate in 1982 would reach about 25 percent, as predicted earlier. He concluded by stating that the latest price rises were made in accordance with a determined program and that the calculated inflation rate for 1982 included these price rises. Later, Housing and Reconstruction Minister Ahmet Samsunlu replied to criticisms levelled at his ministry's budget.

TA271911 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Nov 82

He hoped new labor legislation would enable labor and management to negotiate calmly for their respective rights.

President of Turk-Is Sevket Yilmaz confirmed his confederation stood for social peace and balance instead of class conflict. It stresses collective bargaining as the most effective means of settling disputes. He hoped new labor legislation could be taken up urgently.

ICFTU Rejects Bid

TA270648 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Text] Yesterday, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions [ICFTU] rejected the Turkish Confederation of Labor's [Turk-Is] new application for membership. During its 2-day meeting, ICFTU discussed the Turk-Is bid made on 22 November to resume membership in the confederation. The ICFTU Executive Committee refused, under present conditions, to renew Turk-Is membership in the organization. The committee decided to send a delegation to Turkey not later than May 1983 to examine the situation there before discussing once more the Turk-Is application.

It will be recalled that in its application to the international confederation, Turk-Is pointed out that Social Security Minister Sadik Side would take a leave of absence from his post of secretary general of the Turkish confederation in order to normalize relations between the two organizations.

The ICFTU delegation which is expected to visit our country in a few months will examine the situation of Turk-Is as well as the other workers' organizations before its Executive Committee decides on the Turkish confederation's reinstatement request.

Moreover, a statement by the ICFTU has strongly denounced the limitations imposed on union activities in Turkey and the detention of Turkish labor officials, asking for an early end to trials being conducted against such officials.

AZTAG COMMENTS ON ASSASSINATIONS OF ENVOYS

GF241116 Beirut AZTAG in Armenian 2 Nov 82 p 4

[Article by K. Pakraduni: "The Armenian Terrorist Centers According to the Turks"]

[Excerpts] Twelve days after the assassination of Colonel Altikat, the Turkish military attache in Ottawa, the justice commandos of Armenian genocide assassinated (Bora Sivelkan), the administrative attache of the Turkish Consulate in Burgas, Bulgaria, on 9 September. This assassination has resulted in the reiteration of Turkish warnings. However, due to this assassination the Turks face a new situation. Although Turkish officials have been assassinated in Western countries, this was the first time that a Turkish diplomat was assassinated by Armenian terrorists behind the "Iron Curtain", that is, in an Eastern country. The Turkish media and government paid great attention to this fact.

Facing a new situation, the Turks once again adopted their stance of unbelievers. Turks did not want to believe that the Armenians perpetrated the assassinations of the Turkish ambassadors in Vienna and Paris in 1975, and even today they want to believe or for propaganda purposes want to make others believe that, without the assistance of this or that government, Armenians cannot assassinate Turkish diplomats. In this respect, Turkish dailies have stated that without the assistance of the Bulgarian Government, Armenians could not have assassinated the Turkish official without being arrested in a country where the communists rule, and even "the birds cannot fly" without the knowledge or the will of the Communist Party.

However, even if the Turks will not admit it, they know that the arm of the Armenian terrorism can also reach behind the "Iron Curtain" without the acquiescence of the Communist Party and even against its will.

In this regard, the article by Ahmet Kabakli, well-known columnist of TERCUMAN, is special. In the article he complains that "the blood of the martyrs Talat and Cemal Pashas is still on the floor".

Another article published in the same daily is also characteristic. The author Zafer Atay considers the pretexts of the Western countries, that the Armenian terrorists are not being arrested because they are members of totally secret organizations, as excuses. The author states that he can supply the addresses of the Armenian terrorist centers -- addresses which can also be useful for the "striking groups" -- and with great confidence states that the terrorist centers in Paris are the Armenian culture and the Tashnak centers. By jumping from Europe to the United States, the same article states that "the United States is a paradise for the Armenians" because George Doekmejian can become the governor of California and he has stated that the "Turks have done a lot" to the Armenians. These absurdities make you laugh and think, "poor Turks, is this what you know about the Armenian terrorism? If these are the terrorists, then you have no reason to worry".

Through these pages we have affirmed that Turkey's struggle is not only against Armenian terrorism but the Armenian people and their various workers for their cause. The moment that the Armenian people stop pursuing their cause, Armenian terrorism will stop worrying Turkey even if it loses many victims from among its diplomatic ranks. The warnings of the Evrens and Turkmens are not addressed to the Armenian terrorists but to all the Armenian people, expecting that we, all of us -- and not the terrorists -- will stop our struggle for pursuing our cause.

We believe that the Turkish responses, about which we talked in this article, will not discourage the Armenian people but will further reinforce their will to struggle.

VOTCP COMMENTS ON DISPUTE WITH GREECE; NATO

TA261034 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 26 Nov 82

[Station commentary: "The Turkish-Greek Dispute Cannot Be Solved Through NATO Arbitration"]

[Summary] "Dear Listeners, Turkish-Greek relations have again started to be tense. Turkey is holding maneuvers in the region. It is stated that Turkish planes violated Greek airspace. Meanwhile, it is alleged that an F-5 type Turkish fighter crashed close to Greek territory during the military maneuvers. Following all these developments, the Greek Government cancelled the meeting scheduled to be held between the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers at the beginning of December."

These developments, that increase tension in the region, have occurred at a time when the future of the U.S. bases in Greece are being discussed. The Greek people are in favor of dismantling all the U.S. bases of aggression on their soil, of withdrawing from NATO and of pursuing an independent foreign policy. This wish was expressed during the recent local elections.

"While viewing this new tension in Turkish-Greek relations, these recent developments should be considered. The U.S. and NATO policies are at the bottom of the disputes between the two countries. The Reagan administration wants to guarantee the existence of the U.S. bases on Greek soil through pressure on Greece to be applied by the Turkish junta." The Evren dictatorship's approach to the problem is that of requesting more financial aid and arms from the United States. It has therefore adopted an attitude conducive to increasing the tension between the two countries. For example, the junta generals describe Greece as the rebellious boy within NATO, and are upset about the Greek attitude toward armament, NATO and foreign bases. We can draw the following conclusion: The anti-American and anti-NATO tendency in Greece is among the primary developments which cause the junta to hold consecutive maneuvers. The junta is concerned that such a tendency will affect Turkey as well in the future. "However, this does not mean that there are no other problems between Turkey and Greece. Of course there are problems which have to be solved between the two countries. However, these problems can only be solved through peace negotiations based on equality and outside NATO control. Resorting to NATO arbitration to solve these problems can only increase the tension and complicate the problems. No problem can be solved through a show of power in the region, through the rattling of arms, or through fighter plane maneuvers. Such a chauvinistic and war mongering attitude to problems can only facilitate the implementation of the U.S. plans in the region. The U.S. and NATO are increasing tension and instigating enmities in our region as well as the world."

Another issue one must dwell on is that the democratic and progressive writers in Turkey, who have courageously opposed the 24 January economic decisions and U.S. pressures, and who have voiced the people's and national interests, have adopted a chauvinistic attitude toward Turkish-Greek relations. One should be opposed to the chauvinistic and pro-war policy in our country. The interests of both the Turkish and Greek peoples call for opposition to NATO and pro-American policies.

EEC LEADERS DISCUSS ISSUES AT COPENHAGEN SUMMIT

NC031942 Paris AFP in English 1915 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] Copenhagen, Dec 3 (AFP) -- Leaders of the 10 European Economic Community countries met here today to shore up intra-market cohesion against a developing commercial threat by the United States that surfaced at the recent General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) conference in Geneva.

But the European Council's reinforcement efforts appeared diluted by accusations of protectionism, and a battle over a common fisheries policy.

West German Economy Minister Otto Lambsdorff accused France of protectionism, a charge sharply denied by French government spokesman Michel Vauzelle.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, according to a British source, was expected to push for a conclusion to a self-limitation accord with Japan. Mrs Thatcher was also expected to confront her Danish host, Premier Poul Schluter, over his refusal to go along with the other nine on a common fisheries policies as drawn up by the EEC Commission.

The 24th council summit was also to act on a bid to bring Spain and Portugal into the Common Market. Britain and West Germany called for a "strong political signal" in that direction, but France wanted to hold out until certain financial and economic problems had been ironed out.

The 10 were to deal as well with the problem of sparking the Community's economic growth, stagnating at a projected one percent for 1983, and reducing unemployment, anticipated at 12 million -- or 10 percent of the Community's aggregate population.

Tonight's traditional "fireside talk" at the Christiansborg Castle, seat of Danish Government and Parliament, was to be devoted primarily to an examination of East-West relations in light of the change of power in Moscow. Prospects of detente in Poland and the situation in Afghanistan were also on the unofficial agenda.

The Council today took no specific action on the implicit U.S. threat, raised at last week's GATT conference, to dump low-cost farm surplus on European markets, in retaliation to the Common Market's refusal to phase out farm subsidies.

The fisheries quarrel reportedly turned on Denmark's insistence on the right to fish 20,000 tons of mackerel, and on seven special licenses to fish the Shetland Islands. A British delegate said Britain would make no further concessions, saying, "this is the end of the road, and that is that."

Postpone Spain, Portugal Issue

NC032227 Paris AFP in English 2219 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] Copenhagen, Dec 3 (AFP) -- Leaders of the 10 European Economic Community countries spent the bulk of a five-hour discussion here this afternoon on how to spark the Community's economic growth in the face of stagnating development and an aggregate 12 million unemployed.

It took the heads of state or government only minutes, on the other hand, to postpone the single hard decision they had been expected to make here -- on the entry of Spain and Portugal into their grouping.

KOHL REPORTEDLY SETS VOTE OF CONFIDENCE DATE

DW090937 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2100 GMT 8 Dec 82

[From the "Tagesthemen" program]

[Text] The road to early Bundestag elections on 6 March now seems to have been paved. According to information gathered by our Bonn studio, Chancellor Kohl will submit a request for a vote of confidence next Tuesday. This will reportedly not be linked with any concrete subject.

The vote will then be held a week from Friday following the adoption of the 1983 budget. After final consultations with President Carstens, Kohl will inform the CDU/CSU Bundestag group about his decision. According to DDP, Carstens has already given the green light. The FDP Bundestag group has been summoned for a special meeting tomorrow.

FDP Approves Early Elections

LD091102 Hamburg DPA in German 0956 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- At a special session this morning the FDP Bundestag group approved the procedure by which Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl intends to bring about early elections. Group spokesman Eberhard Hofmann reported that the group endorsed its desire to hold fresh elections on 6 March 1983 by an "overwhelming majority."

There has been speculation during the past few days that the question of fresh elections continues to be disputed among the Free Democrats. Hofmann reported, however, that there were only a few objections. A vote was not taken because the overall opinion was unequivocal. None of the FDP deputies even hinted that they would try and oppose fresh elections by taking the matter to the Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe.

FORTHCOMING VISIT BY EGYPT'S MUBARAK VIEWED

LD090938 Hamburg DPA in German 0013 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- Helmut Kohl's government expects the visit by Egyptian President Husni Mubarak at the beginning of next week to provide important information on the state of Arab efforts for a settlement of the Middle East conflict. According to official government information, Bonn places great store on Mubarak's views. As the president of a "very friendly country," he can expect great attention.

Christian-Democratic Minister of State in the Foreign Ministry Alois Mertes told DPA on Wednesday that Mubarak is coming to Bonn "in an important phase of the development of our Middle East policy." He stressed that Bonn and Cairo hold common positions in many areas; this includes the positive reaction to the U.S. Middle East initiative and the view that the West European states should closely coordinate their Middle East policy with the United States. At the same time, the CDU politician welcomed the present "very important efforts" by the president to bring the viewpoints in the Arab camp closer together.

Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff told DPA that Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl regards Egypt as an "essential stabilizing element in the Middle East peace process." Foreign policy spokesman of the Christian-Democratic parliamentary group Hans Klein said in an interview with DPA that the Egyptian president is consistently continuing "under undoubtedly more difficult circumstances" the peace policy of his predecessor, As-Sadat. "Egypt is one of those countries which have made peace a priority," Klein said.

OFFICIAL GROMYKO VISIT SCHEDULED FOR 16-18 JAN

LD121232 Hamburg DPA in German 1019 GMT 12 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 12 Dec (DPA) -- Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko will come to Bonn from 16 to 18 January for an official visit. This was announced by the foreign office in Bonn today.

Gromyko was invited by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Genscher met Gromyko on the periphery of the UN General Assembly in New York in October and extended the invitation at that time.

BUNDESTAG TO BE DISSOLVED IF 17 DEC VOTE FAILS

LD111400 Hamburg DPA in German 1219 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 11 Dec (DPA) -- On Monday, Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl will explain for the first time to a broader audience the method he has chosen to bring about new elections, before also making a written application on Monday, to the Bundestag president for a vote of no confidence in accordance with Article 68 of the Basic Law. Kohl is to address the CDU/CSU Bundestag group on Monday afternoon. Then he will chair a cabinet meeting where he will also explain his precedure.

Kohl intends to ask President Karl Carstens to dissolve the Bundestag if, as is his intention, he does not receive majority support for the vote of confidence on Friday.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON DUAL DECISION, GENEVA TALKS

LD101242 Hamburg DPA in German 1130 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- In a strongly-worded appeal to the opposition, Defense Minister Manfred Woerner called upon the SPD to keep to "joint principles" in adherence to the NATO dual decision because in that case "there will be a real and serious chance." In a disarmament debate on Friday, at the end of which the Bundestag unanimously ratified the two worldwide treaties on the total ban on bacteriological weapons and warfare affecting the environment, the dual decision and the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles were the focus of Woerner's speech.

Woerner pointed to "the great common responsibility of all parties" to adopt an unequivocal attitude. "Only if the Soviet Union does not for 1 second doubt our readiness to counterarm in the event that it does not dismantle its missiles can things go well," the minister said. Such a clear pressure to negotiate, together with the economic strains which Moscow also has to bear, strengthens his belief in the chances of success in Geneva, Woerner said. One has to repeatedly speak to the Soviets "of our justified security interests also." The USSR knows perfectly well that there is no threat of war from the FRG, which can afford the appropriate defense capability only "with the greatest of effort." The Federal Government also has to make this clear to the peace movement.

Woerner rejected opposition doubts about the U.S. will to negotiate and said that the comprehensive U.S. information on the course of the Geneva talks leaves "no room for doubt about the supreme U.S. interest in a successful negotiation."

SPD thoughts about a security partnership with the Soviet Union were rejected by Woerner under the present circumstances. One can talk about this when Moscow has also taken Bonn's security interests into account. The most important step in this will be the removal of the Soviet SS-20 medium-range missiles, which threaten the FRG above all.

MUBARAK PLANS STOPOVER EN ROUTE TO ROMANIA

AU150945 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0900 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Egyptian President Mubarak will meet with Chancellor Kreisky today at Vienna-Schwechat Airport for a brief exchange of views. The main topic of their talks will probably be the Middle East question. Mubarak has just paid visits to Bonn and Rome. After his stopover in Vienna, he will proceed to Romania, where he will meet with President Ceausescu.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER CHARGES

AU142055 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1830 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Report on press conference given by Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky on 14 Dec after cabinet meeting that day, with Kreisky statement recorded]

[Text] After the cabinet session today the chancellor stated his views about accusations made against Austria in the most recent issue of the U.S. economic magazine, BUSINESS WEEK and affirmed by U.S. Defense Department Undersecretary Fred Ikle in an interview with the Vienna daily DIE PRESSE. Allegedly, there are some 120 Austrian firms which have access to U.S. data banks and to the development of microprocessor plants. Austria -- and this is the specific charge -- is not checking carefully enough the illegal transfer of these details to the Eastern bloc which, for military reasons, are almost always secret, and is also selling the results of its own highly developed metallurgical research which serves military purposes to Moscow. Kreisky, who will meet President Reagan in Washington on 3 February during his official visit to the United States, has now stated in this context that the industrial bosses had credible assured him that the firms are strictly adhering to the contracts.

[Begin recording] So the industrial enterprises are assuring me that they are strictly complying with the agreements. Naturally we shall request information from the U.S. authorities as to specifically what they mean by these accusations. We would not like to be given some sort of shot across the bows -- since there is a small one [kleiner -- presumably country] involved. We would not be very pleased with this. We now will examine whether or not the allegations are true. [end recording]

Paper Carries Ikle Interview

AU141103 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 13 December carries on page 1 a 650-word report by its Washington correspondent Georg Possanner on an interview granted to him by U.S. Defense Department Under Secretary Fred Ikle "seven weeks before Chancellor Kreisky's working visit" to the United States -- date of interview not specified. According to the paper, Ikle was the "first high-ranking member of the Reagan administration to publicly threaten curbing technology exports to Austria if it failed to better control the illegal transfer of such technology to the East." Ikle is also quoted as having criticized Austrian banks for having extended credits to the USSR and other East European countries precisely after the proclamation of martial law in Poland -- "thus throwing good money out the window," and European banks in general for their past "repugnant" practice of granting subsidized loans to the East.

OEVP'S GRAFF RAPS KREISKY ON U.S. RELATIONS

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "U.S. Warnings: Graff Criticizes Kreisky"]

[Excerpt] Vienna -- It is "exclusively the fault of Chancellor Kreisky's neutralist foreign policy" that the United States today "distrusts neutral Austria more than was earlier the case among good friends." Austrian People's Party Secretary General Michael Graff stated this on Tuesday in a release issued by his party's press service. It is completely legitimate if the United States sees to it that technologies that it exports are not passed on to the East, Graff declared.

MUBARAK, KREISKY MEET FOR MIDEAST TALKS

AU151827 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Report on talks between Egyptian President Husni Mubarak and Chancellor Kreisky at Vienna's Schwechat Airport today, with Harry Sichrowsky interviews with Mubarak and Kreisky -- recorded]

[Excerpt] On his European tour, Egyptian State President Husni Mubarak arrived in Vienna from Bonn today. He only made a 2-hour stopover in Vienna-Schwechat, and didn't leave the terminal. There was a more than one-hour converstation between the Egyptian head of state and Chancellor Kreisky in the VIP lounge while Foreign Minister Pahr, Trade Minister Staribacher and Minister of Agriculture Haiden conducted talks with the relevant Egyptian ministers in an adjacent room. Before President Mubarak continued his trip to Bucharest, he appeared before waiting journalists for a short talk. Harry Sichrowsky reports from the brief press conference of the Egyptian state president:

Asked to comment on the proposal for the formation of a Palestinian government in exile, the Egyptian president stated that his government would immediately support such a government. It is well-known, however, that the PLO rejects this. But Mubarak unamibiguously endorsed recognition of Israel by the PLO, even if such a recognition were to remain unilateral.

[Begin Mubarak recording] It will also be a good thing for the Palestinians for their part to declare their unambiguous recognition and thus eliminate something that has constantly been repeated, that is, that the Palestinians seek the destruction of Israel. But if the Palestinians recognize Israel -- the right of Israel [das recht Israels] -- the discussion among all parties concerned will begin. I also want to add the following to this: There is always a debate as to what guarantees or securities there are if the Palestinians recognize Israel, or the right of Israel, and subsequently nothing happens with the Palestinians or with the Palestinian issue. And my answer is as simple and clear as this: This will not be a problem at all, because the Palestinians can also annul this recognition. [end Mubarak recording]

The Egytpian journalists naturally availed themselves of the opportunity to interview Chancellor Kreisky about his position vis-a-vis the two alternative plans for solving the Palestinian problem. The chancellor stated in this context:

[Begin Kreisky recording] First, I would like to repeat what I said several weeks ago, that is, that I welcome President Reagan's initiative very much indeed because to the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that a U.S. president has also recognized and expressed the problem of the Palestinians with such clarity. It seems to me that the correct answer to this [plan] was given in Fes, where the Arab governments gathered there also drafted a plan.

ŒVP CHAIRMAN MOCK TO MEET WITH PRESIDENT REAGAN

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "A.U."]

[Summary] Vienna -- "While Austrian-American relations are again in the focus of public interest owing to the U.S. criticism of Austria's trade with the East, the date for talks between Alois Mock, chairman of the Austrian People's Party [OeVP] and of the European Democratic Union [EDU] was officially announced in Vienna and Washington. Mock will meet with President Reagan on 27 January at the White House at first all alone and then with the entire EDU delegation, and thus will be in Washington even before Chancellor Kreisky."

Mock will be the first foreigner to be given the opportunity to address the "little" congress of the republicans. Both the Republican and Democratic Parties have established contacts with the EDU this year. A delegation of prominent EDU figures, including CDU floor leader Dregger, will also meet with Vice President Bush, Defense Secretary Weinberger, Secretary of State Shultz and Security Adviser Clark.

POLISH COAL SHIPMENTS TO VOEST BACK TO NORMAL

AU201435 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 19 Dec 82 p 7

[Summary] A delegation of the Voest-Alpine Steel Corporation headed by Director General Heribert Abfalter has visited Warsaw for talks on further developing the company's relations with Polish foreign trade agencies and enterprises. According to a report by the Austrian trade delegate in Warsaw, Poland's coal deliveries to the Voest-Alpine Corporation will reach the originally envisaged volume again this year. This development, as well as transit shipments of Swedish ore for the Voest-Alpine via the Szczecin port, have created favorable conditions for an expansion of deliveries by both sides, the report says.

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER ISSUE, LACINA TRIP REPORTED

AU231340 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 23 December on page 1 carries a George Possanner report entitled "Technology Transfer: Lacina's Clarification Mission in Washington," reporting that Austrian State Secretary Lacina has begun talks with Washington officials regarding accusations of illegal technology transfers to the Soviet Union via Austria.

"The most important meeting took place at the State Department. It offered Lacina an opportunity to conduct talks with Richard Burt, former security policy correspondent of the NEW YORK TIMES and designated assistant secretary of state for European affairs, with Richard Perle, assistant secretary of defense, and with Bohdav Denysyk, deputy assistant secretary of commerce for export administration, who had already discussed the problems of technology transfers in Vienna in October."

Vienna KURIER of the same day on page 3 carries an Erich Grolig report entitled "Conflict Over Austrian exports to the East: No Luck With Industrial Spies," reporting on Lacina's talks in Washington and an article published by Moscow PRAVDA on Wednesday in which Moscow said that U.S. charges of technology transfer show disregard for Austrian neutrality. In this context, Grolig notes that "Vienna is seriously annoyed by the attacks from Washington because the United States has 'thus far not proffered any evidence at all.' This assertion is also being officially upheld by the Interior Ministry on Vienna's Herrengasse, though with the reservation that at least illegal technology transfers could not be proved. It naturally is possible that there are some undetected facts, but thus far no instructions have been issued to conduct investigations in this respect."

According to the paper, Austria has been regarded for a long time as a crossroads for the transfer of Western technological developments to the East. "The state police also know this and hence are not at all worried about the American accusations addressed at Vienna. Since the state police have been rather luckless in exposing major industrial espionage cases, they are particularly hoping for clues which would enable them to successfully intervene."

The Vienna NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG in German of the same day on page 3 carries a Peter Gnam interview with Austrian Vice Chancellor Fred Sinowatz about the alleged technology transfers to the East and the Moscow PRAVDA article. "Sinowatz told the NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG: 'We always interpret our neutrality ourselves and have always done extremely well. State Secretary Lacina went to the United States fo find out what the very problem is -- whether the U.S. Administration is really taking the matter so seriously or whether misunderstandings are involved.'

"Sinowatz termed the campaign in American media 'precisely against small Austria as 'strange.' Sinowatz stressed that Austria's good relations with the United States are well known and that this is an unalterable fact. To the question as to whether Washington possibly intends to have Chancellor Kreisky come to Reagan on his knees when he visits him in February, Sinowatz noted: 'He who knows the chancellor knows that he will not do such a thing.' The vice chancellor stated in conclusion: 'We have enough self-assurance to settle this with the United States ourselves; we do not need Soviet assistance.'

"As a matter of fact, Foreign Minister Pahr, who stated to NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG that Austria interprets its neutrality itself and also defends this neutrality itself, maintains the same policy line."

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0610 GMT on 23 December carries a Christian Schueller report on an interview with State Secretary Lacina in Washington after the latter's talks with representatives of the U.S. administration. Schueller reviews the two interviews with Department of Defense officials published by a Vienna paper -- DIE PRESSE -- and Austrian and Soviet reactions and says: "Three days later, one of

FRG DEFENSE MINISTER ON NATO WINTER MEETING

DW011153 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0620 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Interview with Defense Minister Manfred Woerner by reporter Bussi; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] What do you expect from the NATO conference in Brussels?

[Answer] First of all, confirmation of the determination of this alliance and its members to do everything necessary to preserve our peace and security. Second, confirmation of the preparedness to hold serious disarmament negotiations on as comprehensive a basis as possible, and then above all, the determination to improve conventional defense with the help of modern weapons technology, thus raising the nuclear threshold.

[Question] NATO Commander in Chief General Rogers said recently that the alliance must demonstrate political cohesion to achieve a deterrent effect. That has probably not always been the case. What is the current situation among the allies?

[Answer] Well, I believe the prerequisites are quite good. Economic difficulties exist in all countries, at least in all European countries and certainly in the United States as well. However, you can sense the will, the political will, to do everything necessary to create conditions favorable for cohesion.

[Question] Rogers also indicated that some wealthy alliance partners -- he was certainly pointing at the Federal Republic -- could do more for their defense. The Americans are striving for a general arms expenditure increase of 4 percent. Will agreement be achieved after some scuffling?

[Answer] First of all, although the goal of 4 percent is a figure repeatedly used by General Rogers, it has not become an official American, let alone NATO, demand. I believe that in view of the tense financial situation, it is absolutely impossible to achieve a real 4 percent increase in the FRG. We have done what we can. We have given a very high priority to defense. However, more isn't possible and probably won't be next year either.

[Question] The European NATO countries decided yesterday that modernization of conventional weapons systems must be implemented in the medium- or long-term. Won't we have to face considerable new costs as a result?

[Answer] That is a long-term program, as you said yourself, and will certainly entail additional costs, although over a period of about 10 years. On the other hand, efforts must be begun in the fields of research and development to give special priority to the development of the appropriate weapons systems. This can also be achieved by reshuffling finances so that considerable additional costs need not necessarily arise in the next 1-2 years.

[Question] In this connection, there is talk about modern precision weapons and further exploitation of electronic reconnaissance means. Do the Warsaw Pact states already have such equipment, or will NATO achieve a lead in this area?

[Answer] I think we have a clear lead here. However, let me make one thing very clear: We have been forced to undertake all these efforts because in the past few years the Warsaw Pact has considerably developed its ability to launch a conventional attack because it is continuing its conventional arming. I would much rather prefer it if we could achieve true conventional equality with the Warsaw Pact through disarmament in Europe, and not only in Europe, but with the inclusion of the Soviet Union as well. In this event, we wouldn't have to make all these efforts. Therefore, we mustn't neglect disarmament regarding conventional weapons.

ENVOY SAYS FRG DOES NOT LINK CUBANS, NAMIBIA

AB010743 Paris AFP in English 0724 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Johannesburg, Dec 1 (AFP) -- West Germany does not regard the presence of Cuban troops in Angola as the concern of the five-nation Western contact group trying to negotiate peace and independence in Namibia, West German Ambassador to South Africa Eckhard Eickhoff said here Tuesday.

The United States and South Africa are demanding the withdrawal of Cuban troops from neighbouring Angola before they agree to allow Namibian independence.

Mr Eickhoff told a television interviewer that although the demand did not figure in the contact group's independence plan, approved by the United Nations, West Germany shared the aims of the United States to "keep out the influence and military presence of foreign powers" in southern Africa.

He said West Germany, a member of the contact group along with the United States, France, Britain and Canada, was participating in negotiations between the U.S., South Africa and Angola on the presence of Cubans in Angola.

TV: GATT SPELLS POLITICAL DEFEAT FOR WEST

DW301005 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Jochen Schweizer commentary]

[Text] A basis of the economic growth during the past 30 years has been placed at risk in Geneva: free world trade. Only competition beyond national borders made possible the economic and technical progress achieved after the war and demonstrated the superiority of the free enterprise economy over the controlled economy of the East bloc. Without this freedom, the prosperity in the Federal Republic, for example, would be inconceivable. Today, every fourth job in our country depends on exports.

Thus, the impediment of German exports by our trade partners quite clearly spells the impairment of jobs, be it in the Volkswagen plant or in the small specialized factories which produce for foreign countries. Such impediments have become constantly more tangible at nearly all national borders in the past few years. Hardly any government today can resist the domestic pressure of trade unions and the business world to save jobs at home at the expense of the trade partners, even if this is only on a short-term basis.

This is the real result of the Geneva negotiations. The consequence: The trade war which already has flared up in obscurity is allowed to continue. The half-hearted final political advocacy of the principles of free world trade will not convince anybody anymore, least of all entrepreneurs who wish to invest but, if they do, must be sure that they will be able to sell their products on the world markets without any hindrance.

The Geneva attempt to find a way out of the economic crisis has failed. But not only that, the West inflicted a political defeat on itself, for what force of impact can an alliance still muster which quarrels over butter or wheat prices and whose members wage a trade war against each other?

GATT Repercussions

DW301122 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 30 Nov 82 p 2

[Gerd Janssen commentary]

[Excerpts] Granted, an "official" failure of the conference was prevented. Yet, the meager "statement" adopted after endless meetings is an uncovered note. This is primarily applicable to the trade-policy "priorities" which are supposed to be stipulated in the course of the eighties. The fact that the conference participants already picked the next general assembly of the GATT treaty partners next fall for interim balances testifies to carelessness rather than optimism.

The only thing that might remain in the public's mind after the conference spectacle is the impression that the antagonists, the United States and the EC, of all participants, used indiscretions to try to mobilize the public for their own interests on this forum. After the Geneva theater play, little good may also be expected for the consultations between the EC and the United States to be held following the Copenhagen meeting of the European Council.

Produced Mere 'Lip Service'

DW301102 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 30 Nov 82 p 4

[Article by staff writer Volker Woerl]

[Excerpts] Not much was achieved, but it could have been worse. This is briefly, the result of the 4-day world trade conference which was concluded in Geneva Monday with the adoption of a joint final statement. In this statement, to be sure, the GATT ministers come out against protectionism, yet practical headway in the direction of more freedom in world trade did not become evident. Soberly assessing the conference, we must even chalk up to the asset side the fact that no debacle occurred because at times, the meeting threatened to fail altogether. Thus, harsh differences of opinion occurred between the Americans and the European Community over the subsidized agricultural exports, and the French made no bones about the fact that they considered the whole meeting rather useless.

The insistence on national positions will also remain after Geneva, positions of which one expects to gain advantages on a short-term basis. Meanwhile, GATT has long ceased to be a collection of obsolete instruments of tariffs and contingents, but rather, represents an intricately woven wreath of restrictions. In addition to the goods exchange, the foreign investments, and capital transfer, international services and transports are increasingly impeded by numerous harassments.

In the long run, the protectionist reckonings, in particular in the industrial states, will not pan out because protectionism, above all, contains the stimulating forces of competition and levels out the respective productivity advantages.

By all appearances, Geneva just produced lip service. Nevertheless, world trade is based on permanent dialogue. This means continuing the search for common bases and interests, a search whose basis should become even broader. In particular, the bilateral agreements which have become customary in international business actually shouldn't exist within GATT. The larger the negotiating table, the more difficult is it to reach agreement; yet all the more valuable then is that agreement.

KOHL GOVERNMENT IMPROVES RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Article signed ME.: "Goodneighborly a la Kohl"]

[Text] If after 8 weeks in office the Kohl/Genscher governemnt were to claim an achievement over the Schmidt/Genscher government, then it may point to the intra-German field. It did in fact succeed in changing something for the better in the relationship between the two states in Germany. It is not the material field, but in the ambiente, in the style of dealing with one another. Ever since then, the Bonn creed of absolute consideration for East Berlin's merely expected sensitiveness is no longer valid, breathing has become freer -- on both sides. Everybody says what he means even if it is unpleasant to him, and relations are not worse than before. Even the little word "goodneighborly" still exists, whatever it may be worth or mean. There is even talk of the much-discussed Honecker visit to the Federal Republic, which correctly is not regarded as very pressing over here or over there.

The happening is that nothing has happened. There have not been threats nor even the airing of grudges at the meeting of the SED Central Committee: and if certain manifestations by Bonn were described as "dreams of a greater Germany" this is not at odds with this assessment. On the contrary, it is conclusively confirmed by the GDR party and state leadership's distinct efforts toward establishing sound foundations for German-German relations and their further development. What is apparent the same direction is Honecker's effort toward saying something as pleasant as possible about the federal president, with whom he spoke in Moscow at Brezhnev's funeral, as well as about the federal chancellor.

It would be mistaken to draw the conclusion that pussyfooting now has become an East Berlin habit rather than a Bonn one. But it is obvious that conditions have improved. This has not only something to do with the GDR's economic situation, which can only be glossed over by repeatedly pointing to the number of West German unemployed. Rather, it is also the leadership change in Moscow which has prejudiced the East Berlin leadership. It has ended the particularly close relationship between Brezhnev and Honecker. This is why the situation for the GDR regime is not particularly favorable for talking big of even performing strong-arm acts in the German-German field -- not even for status demands as they were raised by Honecker in Gera two years ago, such as: separated citizenship, demarcation of the Elbe border and upgrading permanent representatives to the rank of ambassadors. It has been 10 years since, intra-German policy has been on such a good track.

NEGOTIATIONS ON SCIENCE AGREEMENT WITH GDR

[Excerpts] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) -- Negotiations with the GDR on the conclusion of an agreement on cooperation in science and technology were continued in Bonn today, after an interval of 1 year. There have been negotiations on such an agreement between Bonn and East Berlin since 1973. Until now the main obstacle has been the Federal Government's continuing desire to include West Berlin scientists in such an agreement.

Research and Technology Minister Heinz Riesenhuber (CDU) received the head of the GDR delegation, State Secretary Wolfgang Leupold, for a courtesy visit in connection with the new round of negotiations. The Research and Technology Ministry said afterwards that a seminar on long-distance heating and thermal coupling, which is to be held for experts from the two German states in 1983 in Juelich, was also discussed on this occasion.

SPOKESMAN: BORDER INCIDENT STRAINS GDR RELATIONS

LD291750 Hamburg DPA in German 1707 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Hirschberg/Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- An escape bid by a family of four from the GDR to Bavaria was evidently foiled close to the Hirschberg, Hof rural district frontier crossing point. A statement by the Bavarian Ministry of the Interior quotes two travellers as saying that a car from the GDR, pursued by a police car with its sirens going was seen driving up to the lowered barrier. At the barrier, the driver showed bystanders a bullet hole in his windshield. GDR border guards then sprayed a liquid through the open side window, whereupon the driver accelerated, driving through the barrier and ending up in a metal fence. GDR border guards dragged a woman and two children from the burning car and took them away. They then covered up to body of the driver lying on the shoulder of the road.

Statements by travellers about 'unusual clearance formalities' suggest that officials had been waiting for the fugitives.

The Federal Government has expressed its shock at the incident at the Hirschberg frontier checkpoint. This fresh incident focuses public attention on the cynical nature of the border barriers, a spokesman of the Ministry for Inner-German relations said. The Federal Government cannot conceal the fact that such incidents place a heavy strain on relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR.

FANFANI AGREES TO FORM COALITION GOVERNMENT

LD301724 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1600 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] The government crisis is over. Premier-Designate Amintore Fanfani this morning withdrew his reservations at the presidential palace and agreed to form the new government. It will be a four-party coalition composed of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals. The Republicans remain uncertain, and will have to decide whether to abstain or to vote for the government. Fanfani is now working on the list of ministers, and it is practically taken for granted that the ministers in charge of the three economic departments will be changed. Before presenting the new coalition to the chambers of Parliament it will be necessary to elect the new president of the Senate in lieu of Fanfani, a post which will almost certainly go to a Christian Democrat. The candidates for this include Senators Morlino, Taviani, Rumor and Bonifacio.

BULGARIA HOLDS TWO ITALIANS ON SPY CHARGES

AU010853 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Sofia, December 1 -- The pre-trial investigation of charges of espionage against two Italian nationals detained since August 27 in Bulgaria has been concluded. Italian Ambassador to Sofia Carlo Maria Rossi Arnaud learned Tuesday from Deputy Foreign Minister Lyuben Gotsev.

The ambassador conferred with the deputy foreign minister on the case of Bulgarian national Ivanov Antonov, arrested Thursday in Rome by anti-terrorist police on a charge connected to the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II on May 13 last year.

The two Italians held in Bulgaria, Gabriella Trevisan and Paolo Farsetti, face prison terms ranging from 10 to 20 years if found guilty of the spy charge against them.

The pair were arrested while attempting to cross the border into Turkey after being stopped by border police who asked them to pay export duty on a porcelain coffee service.

Farsetti is in prison in Sofia and Trevisan is in a national security prison.

The precise nature of the charge against them was not disclosed.

ANGOLA AGREES ON OIL, RAILCARS, ELECTRICITY

AB292013 Luanda ANGOP in French 1635 GMT 29 Nov 82

[Text] Lisbon, 29 Nov (ANGOP) -- Luis Fontoura, the Portuguese secretary of state for cooperation, disclosed last Saturday in Lisbon that the People's Republic of Angola will refund 50 percent of Portugal's contribution to the financing of reinforcement work on the Cambambe Dam in the People's Republic of Angola by supplying Portugal with oil. This important project represents a superior investment of $156 million, (about 4,680 billion kwanzas) out of which $100 million will be used to purchase hydro-electromechnical equipment to be supplied by Portuguese industry.

Luis Fontoura, who made these statements soon after his arrival at Lisbon airport on his way back to Portugal from Sao Tome and Principe, also disclosed that a compromise agreement had been reached with the Angolan minister of energy and oil supplies, Pedro van Dunem, on the active participation of Portugal in the pursuit of oil research and exploitation in one of the most promising sectors of the Angolan continental shelf.

In accordance with the important agreement signed, a Portuguese geological and mining mission is expected very soon in Angola. Provisions have also been made for the reconstruction of the Luanda refinery by a series of Portuguese companies. Luis Fontoura also disclosed that an agreement had been signed for the construction by a Portuguese firm of a number of railway cars for the Angolan Railway Corporation. According to the ANGOP correspondent in Lisbon, the Portuguese firm Sorefame will build 52 coaches and 6 boxcars for the Benguela Railway on the basis of a signed contract worth about 1,650 million escudos.

The Portuguese secretary of state for cooperation also added that during his visit to Angola he also had the opportunity to discuss with Angolan Minister of Planning Lopo do Nascimento problems related to the improvement of the living conditions of Portuguese cooperation officials in Angola, especially in the fields of education and housing and the supply of basic needs.

In addition, Luis Fontoura said that he and the Angolan authorities seriously studied the possibility of seeking ways in which Portuguese and Angolan boats may fish in Angolan territorial waters.

The Portuguese secretary of state ended his negotiations with Angola on the issue of the Sonefe Company for the production and distribution of electricity after the Angolan Government had announced the payment of compensation. The payments to shareholders will be made in Portugal within a year after the repayment of the bank credits granted for the construction of the Cambambe Dam and the transport and distribution lines. "The value of these credits, together with the payment of shares in the public sector, will be the basis of a dollar fund for the creation of joint Angolan and Portuguese ventures in the electricity sector or even in other sectors," Luis Fontoura stressed in conclusion.

GONZALEZ INVESTITURE ADDRESS ON GOVERNMENT PLANS

LD010328 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1530 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Investiture address delivered by Spanish Prime Minister-elect Felipe Gonzalez at the Congress of Deputies in Madrid — live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen deputies: As I prepare to seek investiture in accordance with the provisions of Article 99 of the Constitution, I want above all to convey to the chamber, and to the citizens we represent, my certainty that this occasion is not a mere formality. On the contrary, we are living a day which is historic and decisive for our future. Historic, because today is the beginning of the change. Decisive, because with these first steps along the new road, we are now beginning to shape its course. I proclaim this with the satisfaction of being just one more of those who have struggled for this day. I also proclaim this with due humility because it is the Spanish people who have freely and peacefully instituted the change. We are merely those who have been charged with the honorable task of carrying it forward. For evidence of what I am saying, it is sufficient to take a look at this chamber and compare its members with those of just a few weeks ago.

Our people have expressed their wish for different chambers, different laws, different ways of doing things -- a government with a different content. That wish has been made clear with such wisdom and evident civic responsibility that our first duty -- the duty of all of us -- must be to appropriately interpret that popular will. The people have voted for change and our duty is to implement it: A change forward, a change attuned to the future, a change toward Spain progressing in peace and freedom. In pursuit of this change, the peoples elected chambers on 28 October in which there is a strong majority -- that is, a solid government — along with other vigorous political forces. I am very pleased that the people have done the right thing in this way, because I believe in the effectiveness of dialogue and participation, which of course requires competent interlocutors. Generosity and loyalty are easier to attain from positions of strength than from weakness, which makes it frequently necessary to resort to the indirect weapons of cunning.

Therefore, I hope that the differences which will naturally arise between us will always be expressed in this chamber with directness and understanding. For my own part, I now offer these things without reservations. The job for all of us is to think about the present and future of Spain, albeit in different ways, and to make these various ways compatible with serving the common interest. This is what the people have asked of us with their resounding vote. It is on the basis of that mandate and not through some formal routine that I am asking this chamber to endorse me as prime minister.

Why do I ask for this endorsement? To govern, naturally. That is obvious, but it is important to affirm it without bitterness in the clear realization that in the past, many citizens frequently felt as if they were not being governed. To govern does not simply mean to watch out for the bends in the road. To govern is to be guided by the shape of the horizon, to have a clear long-term destination and a perspective that gives a clear meaning to daily concerns. To govern is to look with hope and excitement toward that destination, while acknowledging the initial difficulties and realizing that although the horizon may not be fully attained, we can be satisfied in the humble knowledge that each correct step brings us closer to the goal of a better Spain for all.

The horizon toward which we are striving as socialists with the responsibility for governing all Spaniards is that of increasing more profoundly the freedoms of the peoples of Spain. Having said this, given that the polemics of the recent past and the self-interested obscurantism of the past can introduce much confusion, we must affirm that this horizon simultaneously belongs to the future and to the past.

It is the reincarnation of eternal values, a plan intended to revitalize solidarity among human beings, solidarity which has been weakened by individualism, by corporate egoism and by competitive aggressiveness on the part of very particular social groups. Our sense of change is one projected into the future and based on man's most permanent values, one which rejects a fragmented view of society.

We propose to govern on the basis of three principles which I wish to proclaim in a forthright manner:

Social peace: By this I mean civilian security as a guarantee of the development of freedoms, which is a broader and more noble concept than that of public order reduced merely to calm in the streets. Peace and security in all spheres -- at work, at play, in creative activity, in the interdependence of our communal life, in international relations.

National unity: This is strengthened by the diversity of our people, by the preferences of different groups, by the peculiarities of this rich and varied world we call Spain. Far from excluding such differences, unity gives vigor to them, thanks to the genuine way in which they are lived by the human beings who embody them. Unity, therefore, in the creative sense of our stimulating and reinforcing one another precisely because we are different, never in the negative interpretation of destructive antagonisms and struggles.

Progress as an instrument at the service of justice: As a concept that goes beyond mere economic development and includes building up national wealth, but at the same time looks to the vital needs of human beings, to their deep need for understanding, for dignity and equality. This obliges us to fight against the differences which grant privileges to certain groups and make outcasts of others.

These bases will allow us to strengthen Spain's presence in the world. However, this will not be with the vain pretension to play a part in international affairs greater than that which befits us. We have a sense of proportion when it comes to locating our country on the scale of world powers. However, we do have an awareness of what we have contributed in the past and of our capacity for the present and for the future. We hope that all these factors will enable us to attain a level truly worthy of us in international life. One can have little and yet be worthy, just as one can have much and be unworthy. As to the latter, I would rather not mention examples of those who make use of their power in order to subjugate or exploit. Peace, unity and progress: that is the outline of the horizon, of our constant goal.

Now I want to turn to the bends along the way, to the immediate situation and our plans. I will mention only the main features because the elections were recent and our broadly-backed program was well publicized. I can say that we intend to keep the people of Spain informed over the coming weeks and months about the situation we have inherited, and in particular when it comes to revealing the budgets. In addition, we will keep the people informed in the future about everything of concern to them. We will do this in a sincere way so that hopes might be based on the true state of affairs and not on distorted or inadequate information or fanciful promises.

I have grouped the material detailed in our election program into four main problem areas. That program is naturally the basis of this government program because only by its fulfilment will we be faithfully responding to the majority vote. I will now enumerate those four areas to make it easier to follow my exposition:

First: Combatting the economic crisis and unemployment;

Second: The advance toward a freer and more egalitarian society:

Third: The progressive reform of the state administration, in fulfillment of Article 103 of the Constitution and Chapter 8, which calls for a fresh distribution of power at the level of the autonomous communities and local bodies;

Fourth: Worthy and effective projection of the reality of Spain to the outside world.

As you know, ladies and gentlemen, these four areas are closely interlinked and can only really be separated for discussion purposes. Thus, reform of the administration is clearly an instrument at the service of both the special goals we propose and the building of the state based on autonomy. Progress in the first areas mentioned strenghens our position in the outside world while simultaneously making use of an effective foreign policy.

Before we move to the problems of the economic crisis, let me recall the serious situation now affecting large areas of Spain, which have been afflicted by the flood disasters. We must give just and urgent attention to these areas.

Nobody should interpret my mentioning economic matters first as a belief that they are of primary importance. Our concern, above all, is man himself, and material goods are to be seen as instruments at his service and not as aims in themselves. What is important to us is to establish a society of free citizens, to improve their welfare and make possible a generation of Spaniards ruled by the ideas of ethics and solidarity and not by a system of harsh controls. However, men are limited by and closely concerned about economic problems today because the historical phase in which we are living is dominated by an acute and lasting crisis.

That general crisis, along with our deficient economic structure inherited from the past, means that today we are faced with four basic factors of imbalance: Unemployment affecting 2 million people and remaining at 16 percent of the working population -- this level being 7 points higher than the average for the OECD; inflation with a floor of 14-15 percent "as not been reduced during the last 3 years at a time when it was falling in the developed countries so that the gap between us grew wider by 2, then 4, then 6 points; the balance of payments deficit, which though the current picture shows a slight drop, is compounded by a poor showing in the capital balance and leads to a loss of reserves; and the public administration deficit of approximately 1 billion pesetas in 1982 -- in other words about 5 percent of the gross national production -- which has up to now been showing a rapid increase that threatens to run out of control.

Faced as we are with these four threats, there is one reality which cannot be ignored: Namely, that the margin for maneuver in economic policy is very small for the immediate future. Consequently, given our decision to make maximum use of that margin in the direction indicated by our program, confidence in possible solutions is based mainly on tasks and reforms which we will embark on immediately but which will yield their fruit only in the longer term. Such is reality because the international economic crisis, in contrast to the expansion of the 1970's, will not move out of sight as was being forecast by certain voices ignorant of the true depth of the imbalances affecting us.

Among these imbalances, the one which undoubtedly causes the most human suffering is joblessness. Let us not try to disguise its cruelty by using the milder term of unemployment. Our duty is to live the lack of jobs situation as the drama of every man or woman who is anxious for work but cannot get it, and to live it as an endless sequence of days of frustration and hopelessness. This is not just an economic problem that can be substantially alleviated by subsidies. Joblessness attacks a human being's deepest roots, saps his moral energy and self-confidence, weakens his civic spirit and leads him to question the value of social solidarity. We cannot resign ourselves to hearing the young apprentice or university student repeat what is becoming a cliche: "We are studying to be jobless." That leads only to disillusionment, to a rejection of the system and to rebellion.

Equally, we cannot stand by and see mature and responsible men and women have their dignity wounded by dismissal, as though they were incapable of working to ensure the needs of their loved ones, as they they had nothing to contribute with their efforts in behalf of Spain's progress. Joblessness is an undeserved moral punishment, as well as a material punishment implicit in the hard times it brings upon those who suffer it.

Yet the fact of joblessness being a worldwide scourge -- more serious in Spain than in the developed countries -- does not relieve us of the duty of ferociously combatting it. In this priority area of struggle we will use all the instruments available, and all our efforts: From investments to create jobs, to changes and reductions in working hours; from changes in techniques and in sectors, to public support for contracts for those sectors where jobs are hardest to get; from help in retraining workers for new jobs, to the application of such means in both private firms and the public sector; in both agriculture and industry; in both construction service industries; both in the area of retraining and in that of exporting to foreign markets. We will not miss the slightest opportunity to create work.

If in a particular sector or for a particular period of time job loss becomes inevitable, we will bring into play the solidarity of all so that those affected will not be put into a position of unbearable helplessness and misery. In the same way, we will combat employment swindles -- in their multifarious forms -- which are degrading to all those involved, be they workers or employers. This, like tax fraud, the flight of capital and other kinds of offenses connected with economic activity, will be pursued with the tenacity the law requries and with the severity deserved by such attitudes of selfishness.

The actions required cannot come solely from the government. Rather, they call for a change in the attitude of society as a whole. No one should think that joblessness is going to be reduced by leaving its solution soley to the automatic mechanisms of the market. Such reliance on automatic procedures would lead us instead into an enormous increase in social inequality and to the social decomposition that flows from the selfish attitude of "every man for himself". It is for this reason that I have tried to highlight the gravity of the human drama of joblessness. It is for this reason, too, that I urge all those affected by the problem to bend their imagination and their efforts toward the decisive policy whose aim, as our program makes clear, is to create 800,000 jobs in 4 years. I am aware that this objective has been dubbed as ambitious by our critics. But it must be kept in mind that the 1982 national employment agreement proposed the creation of 350,000 jobs in 1 year to compensate for the loss of an equivalent number. This was regarded as a realistic way of tackling the problem. We therefore consider it possible to reverse this latter trend: In other words, first of all halt the growth in the jobless rate and then in subsequent years bring it down to levels close to those in the developed OECD countries.

The second grave imbalance is inflation. Some people prefer to put this in first place. For our part, we know that this problem and that of joblessness are interlinked within the whole interdependence of economic dysfunctions. We are also aware of the damaging repercussions that inflation has on savings, on investment initiatives, on the balance of payments and on the value of the currency. As we see it, to put it in simple terms, inflation is the problem of those who see the purchasing power of their cash decline, while the drama of those without jobs is that they cannot even get hold of that cash in the first place. That said, it is clear that inflation requires a policy just as decisive and vigorous as does the struggle against joblessness. Inflation needs to be combatted through the use of a strict monetary policy, as well as through all the remaining available instruments, including in particular responsible agreements among the various social forces, agreements which have proven themselves to be indispensable.

Our aim for 1983 is to reduce the inflation rate by 3 points as compared with 1982. To that end, we will also act decisively to halt the growth in the public debt, to conduct an appropriate monetary policy and propitiate the necessary social agreements as outlined in our program. We propose a 2 and 1/2 percent growth in the gross national product as a goal for 1983, without inflation going above about 12 percent. The expansion of liquid assets will be held in 1983 to a figure of around 13 percent in order to make possible, along with the forecast performance of other liquidity factors, the attainment of the above goals.

All of this will require a notable effort by the Spanish economy at a time when the international context is unfavorable, since forecasts for 1983 for the countries of our area as recently revised by the OECD point to zero growth and an increase in job losses next year. Only in subsequent years will we be able to take advantage of positive international trends, thanks to probable stability in oil prices, to the attainment of some success in combatting inflation, and to less selfish and more responsible financial policies by the great powers than those we are currently contemplating.

Now, as in combatting job losses, in the fight against inflation too, it is indispensable that everyone play their part, accept the need for greater efforts in savings and investment and resist all temptations to engage in a headlong expansion of consumption, which would be inappropriate to the present circumstances of the Spanish and the world economy.

For its part, the balance of payments -- being the product of domestic activity and its interaction with the outside world -- is undoubtedly the front on which action is most at the mercy of the surrounding framework. On the one hand, this is because its deficit is to a great extent dependent on developments on outside world markets that are beyond our control. On the other, it is because an in-depth correction of the underlying problems is dependent on domestic developments which require a longer period. I will not go as far as to detail these factors. Additionally, the correction of other imbalances -- greater domestic saving, success against inflation, greater competitiveness through reduced costs, controlled monetary expansion -- will have favorable effects in reducing the foreign debt.

Another fundamental imbalance is the deficit in the public sector, whose growth we first intend to halt and then in subsequent years reduce at the same time we are restructuring public spending. We wish to move further toward constructive investment and transfers. We are fortunate to have more levers in our hands to control this problem than was so in the preceding case, especially if a generalized attitude of austerity, hard work and cost effectiveness has the effect of reducing the unacceptable custom of trying by means of subsidies or other kinds of public aid to alleviate problems which were not attacked at their root causes because of ignorance or lack of political will. Whatever the case, the attitude of increasing the public debt through negligence, by financing it in an inflationary way, far from being a panacea to resolve the problems, is a grave irresponsibility that strikes at the weakest sectors. So rigorous preference must be given to financing through clearly-planned public revenue, through spending regarded as socially necessary or desirable.

On the other hand, the inconsistencies and dysfunctions which have accumulated in the public sector undoubtedly offer a very broad field in which we can act rigorously with the aim of obtaining the maximum yield from the funds channeled into the state by the people as a whole. Our wish is to immediately embark on necessary institutional reforms to improve the effectiveness of the administration in all its aspects and to attain a situation in which control of spending will be not merely formal in nature, but will be capable of showing that efficient use is being made of the resources made available to the state.

I shall return to these goals of boosting administrative efficiency as an instrument at the service of the people before concluding, because it is there that we can and must exercise the greatest pressure for reform with the objective of making the public sector an example of austerity, correct action and efficiency; pressure carrying the parallel obligation of operating against tax fraud, which is one of the most damaging and regrettable expressions of selfishness on the part of certain Spaniards toward others and of the irresponsibility of those who refuse to bear their part of the collective sacrifice. The opportunity to set out our ideas in depth on all of this will be provided by the debate on the 1983 general state budgets.

At this stage, what I will say is that the way we view public spending will turn this change into one of the most effective weapons for combatting injustice while simultaneously promoting economic progress. The latter statement should not be interpreted as interventionist in direction, scornful of private initiative or overconfident about the potential of the public sector. We view the public sector much more as an incentive to the whole than as an element overriding initiatives from other social groups, as well as a means for allocating resources, which is of the greatest importance because of its redistributive functions, which are essential to correct the inequalities which still exist in this country. These are inequalities against which we as Socialists will continue to fight, wherever they may appear, be it in education or culture, in the area of labor or in the dreadful situation of outcast or underprivileged groups. In this connection, the public sector, in addition to being one of the basic levers for stimulating and supporting priority initiatives, also holds out the possibility of offering a range of social services which are essential nowadays in all advance countries. There is no contradiction here with the fact that in an economic system like the Spanish one it is the private sector which is decisive in determining the volume of goods and services produced and of investment and jobs. We said this expressly in our election program. So our economic policy will provide incentives as far as it can for all initiatives which create wealth, with additional facilities for those smaller companies which, because of their size, find it harder to get help from the financial intermediaries or to export to outside markets.

It could be thought appropriate now to conclude what I have been saying about the standpoint we shall take for tackling the basic problems by coming now to details relating to the most varied sectors from specific problems affecting a certain number of companies in crisis, to the reconversion in depth required by those sectors of industry hit by that crisis; from the difficulties afflicting the fishing industry to the traditional ills afflicting agriculture which, alongside purely technical problems, also has social problems in solving dramatic job losses and is crying out for a policy capable of making large rural areas of the country fit to inhabit with dignity.

It might be thought necessary to enumerate efforts to be made to intensify energy saving through the practice of a realistic price policy and through preparing our industry to compete with powerful firms in countries around us and to achieve a more efficient financial system capable of flexibly dealing with our economy's needs for medium- and long-term credit. One should also speak about how to give the country an adequate infrastructure as regards housing, public works, transport and communications. However, all these and many other specific aspects would add nothing to what is already known from our program and would make this exposition excessively long so that they are better left for a debate at a later stage when the specific issues of interest to this house can undoubtedly be raised.

I shall therefore limit myself to saying that our immediate political plans form part of a longer-term perspective for dealing with the fundamental problems, because everyone must see clearly that there can be no rapid escape from the crisis nor can there be any rapid substantial improvement in the effectiveness of our productive apparatus or economic performance. Rather, on the contrary, these things require persistent progress toward the objectives set out.

Combining our economic measures correctly, both among themselves and through time, is of great importance for heightening their effectiveness, thanks to the timetable which has been planned and in order to achieve harmonious evolution, which will reduce to a minimum the disturbances which are part and parcel of any reform by establishing a planning process which is agreed rather than imposed, as we propose in the program we have offered the country. Thus, possible and desirable ways of developing our main macroeconomic objectives which point the way to overcoming our current problems are offered. In this way, uncertainties among businessmen will be reduced, public and private sector decisionmaking will be facilitated and greater consistency will be achieved among them. Such planning must allow for the whole of the government's economic policy to be brought together and increase the likelihood that the intended results will be achieved.

In short, we are faced with an economic panorama which is undoubtedly difficult. But it is equally certain that we shall be tackling the problems with the backing of the political majority we enjoy, which perhaps has no historical precedent in this country as far as its significance and its size are concerned. There are no easy roads to solving our problems. The only way is through efforts, through work, through responsible attitudes and tenacity. However, solutions do exist and they can be achieved through joint action by a majority of the people in support of an economic policy rationally put together and well coordinated, a policy capable of hastening our advance toward a modern situation embracing both social justice and material well-being, which have been denied us in our recent history.

As for the huge field of social policy, the second of the problems mentioned, following my introductory words, there is little need to explain that it is in this field where we are seeking the main results of the actions undertaken in other areas. What we are concerned about is the people. Our objective is to see that economic growth comes from everyone and is for everyone. Otherwise it would be unjust to appeal for solidarity as we are constantly doing as the condition needed for the resurgence of the country. For this reason, general improvements in the area of social security and the different rates of contributions will be given special attention as laid down in our election program. Very specifically, the maintenance of the purchasing power of pensions will be guaranteed by means of a law on automatic reassessment of such pensions.

Institutional mechanisms will also be created, which are not just economic in nature, for establishing a democratic framework of labor relations, and attention will be given to maintaining the purchasing power of wages. In this way, a contribution will be made to reducing the tensions in all negotiations, and both worker and employer will be able to pose their problems and modify their expectations in a more rational way.

Before I pass on to other aspects concerned with this sector, I should like to make special mention of three groups of people deserving of special treatment: young people, who will be supported through youth employment programs, short-term contracts and other measures, so-called senior citizens for whom, among other special provisions, we shall offer a special range of health and geriatric services; and women, the persistent discrimination against whom must for sake of justice increasingly be corrected. As I have said on a number of occasions, the dignity of a nation is measured by the way it treats groups on its fringes such as invalids, prisoners, the totally destitute, ethnic groups who remain separate such as the gypsies, etc. Despite the difficulties of the economic situation I have just been outlining, we shall nevertheless begin to lay the bases to integrate these people into society.

Health policy will be based on promoting good health, on individual and collective prophylactic measures, on primary assistance, efficient treatment and on returning the patient to society. Whatever the case, health care is often concerned with illness stemming from the way of life. People's housing, their environment, the education they have had or the place where they live, among many other factors, have an effect on their health as well as being among the basic needs to which attention needs to be given.

As for housing, our planned policy provides for the creation of an adequate infrastructure capable of generating the preconditions for the activities of the construction industry, along with a series of improvements, especially in financing purchases as well as public promotion of renting schemes. However here, as in other areas, we should like to make a reality of implementing new ideas and reducing costs through suitable approaches and designs which in many cases are already known to the experts but whose introduction has been delayed by speculative interests. This covers a range of things from legal conditions on land ownership to defective town-planning regulations. Introducing the changes needed in order to do away with hindrances in housing policy will be one of the important aspects of administrative reform.

The environment is a vital component in human life. Irresponsibly damaging it not only leads to health or psychological disturbances, but through the effect of aggressive destruction, also diminishes the quality of life. The mounting protests from the ecologists to be heard everywhere, especially in the industrialized countries, come from that human sensitivity toward one's environment and are evidence of the need to adopt measures such as we have included in our program.

In any event, the approach to and the solution of the problems of welfare have to begin within each of us by enriching individual possibilities through education and culture. More than in economic compensation, even in the collective social services, it is in this field of education where the key to social progress is to be found. Education increases the quality of opportunities by promoting individual capabilities and, therefore, the exercise of more fitting tasks. Moreover, the exercise of public liberty is only fully achieved with an education which teaches us about our rights and the means to demand them and which at the same time inspires us to respect the rights of others.

Cultural wealth also increases the pleasure which can be provided by the benefits from public services of this kind or from the environment itself. Above all, and without intending to deal with the subject in its entirety, I shall only recall that social progress is the work of man, that it is man who makes history. This all explains the fact that education and culture are key features of our future task of government with the aim of achieving the advanced democracy advocated in our Constitution. For this, the constituent text establishes rights such as the freedom of expression, the overcoming of socio-economic discrimination and equality of opportunity in cul re as the decisive instruments for the full development of the personality of man.

In short, the transformation of Spain and its progress demand special educational and cultural action because the backwardness in this field is still very considerable. To develop the Spanish educational system to cover this gap is not only a constitutional mandate, but also the obligation of all. It is important to note that the deficiencies are not only quantitative but also qualitative. The past enthusiasm for statistics which measures progress in this field by the multiplication of centers of education, school places or similar indicators has to be complemented with a closer examination of the reality of the matter together with the study of educational methods, programs, the participation of parents and teachers and, above all, the very contents and orientation of education.

It is not only a question of making general increases and improvements but also of contributing once again to dignity and justice. In Spain, profound differences persist between classes and sections of society insofar as levels of higher education are concerned, and what is even more distressing is that these differences are passed on from father to son. Studies which we have carried out enable us to state that the sons and daughters of the upper classes have had 28 times more opportunities of reaching the university level than the sons and daughters of modest workers. As in all democratic countries, our education policy will aim to create equality of opportunity.

In the field of education it is imperiative that we pull the universities out of the crisis and prostration in which they now find themselves and rehabilitate them in their own eyes and in the eyes of society because vigor and educational genuineness emanates down from them to the lower levels of education. The great majority of the university community wants to carry out this work of moralization and for some time has demanded an institutional framework which would permit it to do so. To this end, the government will put forward a new draft law on university autonomy within a reasonable period of time in order to give the universities real autonomy of action, function and government. Additionally, geographical and cultural discrimination, which is contrary to university access, will be done away with by means of grants and special programs as well as by new methods in the national open university.

Related to the universities is an area as decisive for progress as scientific and research policy. It is no longer possible to continue to maintain scientific and technical stagnation, which slows down economic progress and human development. It is necessary to integrate research into Spanish society and provide a driving force for a science which is at the service of man and the quality of life in order to move toward a different model of development. To do this, the budget for research will be substantially increased and will be concentrated on strategic investments. However, merely increasing expenditures is not enough. Funds also has must channelled through serious institutional reform, ensuring coordination to prevent duplication of efforts and drawing up a single budget to suppress bureaucratic obstacles in the way of creative ability.

I have spoken at length about education because in the long term this holds the key to Spain's future. Education, like no other activity, is the guarantee of progress for man himself, and this is the central goal of all our labors to which all other lines of political action are subordinated. However, in itself, education is nothing more than a part of culture and acts in its service and for its preservation and improvement.

Culture embodies our view of the world, our scale of values and our interpretation of life. While in the fields of research and science we have to lament that we have fallen behind in comparison with our relative position in the past, our culture, has despite acts of negligence and prevarication, managed to maintain human values as lofty as those which are held by other cultures in the world. This is especially true in the deepest manifestations of popular life, which are recorded in art and literature and which we have to preserve as the very roots of our personality and as the source from which springs the most noble and energetic motivation for artistic and literary creation.

In this same direction, the autonomy process will help to sustain and promote the cultural diversities which enrich our lives with their variety. Form this point of view, it is important to react positively against the colonizing effects of culture disseminated by the technological media. The progress achieved by other countries tends to impose their customs, their vocabulary and their values on those countries where the local creation of these things has been weakened. This is even more evident when because of their nature, the technical media can easily cross borders.
The case of radio and television is eloquent testimony of this. Needless to say, the other media will be subject to the same influence, media such as the cinema and theatre, the printed media, the plastic arts, music and, in general, all the forms in which the personality of people is made manifest and in which everyone can experience artistic enjoyment.

At the same time, sport and physical education will provide due complement to this personal self-fulfillment, which is achieved by means of access to culture for all, because in facilitating this access, we are multiplying the sources of personal satisfaction. At the same time, we are creating responsible citizens who are more capable of participating in the construction of a hopeful future.

In the broad area of the problems of society there is a point which I stressed at the beginning of this address concerning security as a guarantee for freedom. The government will comply with the law and will see that the law is complied with. We shall permit no actions outside the Constitution and those who think they can violate it will meet with a severe response from us. We are convinced that our Constitution allows all peaceable citizens to exercise their individual and collective rights and to express their ideas freely. There is, therefore, no explanation for attitudes of violence. We wish, therefore, to appeal to all parliamentary groups and citizens to do their part to ensure civil security and harmonious coexistence in peace and to assure them that neither terrorism, blackmail nor attempts to turn the clock back will divert the government from its decision to comply with the Constitution.

The date of 28 October presents the greatest moral defeat for those who would like to overrule the will of the people by force. This objective will mean that we shall be particularly devoting our attention to improving the professionalism of the security forces in order to increase their effectiveness and more broadly link their activities to the aspirations and expectations of all of our people. By the use of these human resources, who have already demonstrated their spirit of sacrifice and determination to overcome all adversity, we shall combat violence in order to see that peace and calm become established immovably. We are very much aware that in such a climate it will be easier to resolve the rest of the problems in our national life. For that reason, we shall vehemently call for the international cooperation needed in the great task of erradicating terrorism.

Public security and liberty require not only the provision of adequate forces against destabilizing violence, but also the provision of an organization of justice which is equal to its mission, an organization which has once again placed the members of its administration, the vast majority of whom are capable of carrying out their duties enthusiastically and competently, in a situation of frustration because of the structure in which they find themselves and because of the lack of means, these being the basic causes of the present deficiencies.

We propose to introduce procedural and other kinds of reforms to speed up the judicial machinery in order to avoid unnecessary and unjust overcrowding in the prisons, improve the situation of the inmates and guarantee citizens the satisfactory administration of justice, which implies free legal representation as one more element of social equality.

Along this line, and to conclude this subject, it is our decision to establish as soon as possible the constitutional figure of the defender of the people, whose intervention has so far been delayed and who, in our opinion, is an essential complement of justice since he brings within the reach of citizens more immediate channels for their grievances to be heard and to be conveyed to the centers of administration where they may be studied and resolved.

However, it is not only justice, but the whole of the administration which requires serious reforms. With this, I should now like to look at the third area which I have enumerated; reforms to free the administration from inherited obstacles, from antiquated procedures and from intolerable corruption in order to turn it into an effective example of service. Already, in another part of this speech, I stressed the great importance of administrative machinery which is capable of being the backbone of the public sector. Professional competence, the spirit of service and ethics by all possible means must be foremost in the inspiring principles of the public bodies. Only as an instrument which responds to the purpose and aims of the government will they turn our plans for austerity, for the effectiveness of public spending and for efficacy in the promotion of national activities into reality. A law on the reform of public spending is already anticipated and is linked to the legal plans which develop the improvement of public service. In anticipation of this, we propose to freeze in the budget expenditures of certain items, especially those on some purchases and transfers, and demand from all public bodies rigorous justification when they apply for additional funds to meet their needs.

The budgetary offices of each ministry will be empowered to fulfill their dutues effectively in cooperation with the central services of the Ministry of Finance. Austerity and rigor in the use of public funds will therefore be criteria which will be emphatically demanded.

The reform of the administration is not only confined to its judicial or financial branches, but has to encompass all of them. We firmly believe that part of the defects which may seem human today are not due to personal failure but to the demoralization which afflicts the civil servant when he is forced to work in a defective system. The great majority of public employees without a doubt prefer to form part of a system which enhances their own dignity and which merits the highest esteem of our people. The necessary moralization of the public service will have its first expression in an immediate proposed law on incompatibilities which, by way of example, will focus its opening clauses on deputies, senators and high-ranking posts in the administration.

This task of reform and reorganization, which is essential to achieve our other goals, has to be coordinated with the culmination of the autonomy process, with the passing of the statutes of the four remaining autonomous communities as soon as possible. In this field, the regulation of which is aimed at stimulating plurality within integrated unity, I state our commitment to achieve the constitutional maximum in the areas of jurisdiction established by the respective statutes. With the autonomy agreements, and once the remaining statutes have been approved, we shall have laid the foundations for the autonomy process to come about in an orderly, objective and unifying manner.

There remains, however, one great task outstanding. It is not enough to transfer jurisdictions, civil servants and resources. During the coming legislative period there will, above all, be a need to complete the construction of the self-governing states principally by means of the legislative development of Article 149/1 of the Constitution. We shall thus enter a kind of second phase of the autonomy process in which the positive development of each self-governing state has to harmonize with the construction of the state of all people. In this respect, laws such as the bases of the statute of public service, the law on common administrative procedure, the bases of the budgetary, financial and accounting system, the bases of administrative transaction, the legislation on the responsibilities of the administrations, their authorities, civil servants and agents and the legislation on public property and capital will be decisive.

These laws have a systematic unity. Their whole is going to define a new model for public administration and all of them respond to the same logical and motivating force. They are, moreover, constitutional laws or those which serve as the framework of party political activity rather than being the result of this activity. For this reason, they should be laws resulting from the broadest possible agreement among the parliamentary forces. In this respect, the government will propose to all the parliamentary political forces that a wide-ranging institutional agreement on the key points or main axes of this group of laws be drawn up. The text of this agreement and that of the individual votes on the same will serve as the basis to draw up the corresponding draft of proposed laws and their amendments and will also serve as the point of reference for the corresponding parliamentary debate.

We believe that this time of hoped for change is propitious for constructive negotiation, and we shall channel all our efforts and good will into this. To conclude this instrumental but decisive area of the organization of the state, I shall say only that the system of participation with which we want to strengthen the creative capacity of Spaniards also necessitates the reform and improvement of local administration which will permit the broader development of its own autonomy. To this end, our program includes a draft law which modifies the present law on matters of local elections and permits the reorganization of the present corporations in terms of the most adequate democratic representation.

To the same end, during the present period of sessions, a draft bill will be proposed on local administration and another will be proposed on the financing of local bodies, whose possibilities of action will be further boosted by a plan for collaboration set up in agreement with the Spanish federation of municipalities and provinces without prejudice to other measures such as the transfer of services, technical assistance and the reform of the Institute for the Study of Local Administration. The result will be the completion of a decentralized system of public administrations, because in this way we shall boost democracy and solidarity precisely in the grassroots structures where the contact between people is more direct, where concrete problems are experienced and where the public can feel more warmly the pride of solidarity and the fruits of participation.

I would now like to refer to foreign policy, which must be closely linked to internal development within the framework of a general political orientation. In these essential plans, there should be no place for improvisation, contradiction or inconsistency. Foreign policy should be free from partisan ideas and should rigorously follow the directives of a state policy mindful of the nation's permanent interests, which result from a national consensus if this is possible or, at least, from aspirations expressed by the majority of our people. The government will immediately begin to define and implement a foreign policy that strengthens Spain's role in the international order, that affirms our presence on an equal footing in those places where national interests are at stake and that permits our country to actively contribute to the great causes of world peace and detente. To do this we must begin with an exact idea of our capacity for action in the world without boastfulness and without complexes. We are aware of our actual level of power and influence among nations. We also know our resources and our potential.

The problems that will inevitably demand our attention will be those in our immediate vicinity. We believe it is essential to strengthen and deepen our relations with neighboring countries -- Portugal, France and the Maghreb countries. Transitory differences should never lead us to forget the need for mutual understanding and beneficial cooperation for all. In this way, we will also contribute to the equilibrium of the Mediterranean region, whose importance on the international scene is growing daily.

Our policy toward our neighbors has privileged status and within this I would single out Portugal. On the basis of the most scrupulous respect for the positions and interests of each side, a Spanish policy which did not make friendship and cooperation with Portugal one of its main priorities would lack vision and realism.

There is no need to reiterate our European vocations, our willingness to contribute to a Europe of men and peoples. We will work tenaciously along this line in order to overcome the obstacles which still stand in the way of our full integration into the European communities. We believe that it would not be presumptuous to achieve membership within the period of the present legislature.

Spain is part of the Western world; we share and defend its basic human values. However, we claim our right and duty to freely determine in the exercise of our sovereignty the form of Spain's participation in the policies and defense of this whole. For this reason, we will study with the utmost care the terms of our defense and cooperation relations with the United States. With the rigor necessary for the defense of our interests and dignity, we will reexamine the decision adopted by the previous Spanish Government regarding the North Atlantic Treaty, thereby maintaining our commitment to the Spanish people. We will do all of this with the national and international dialogue demanded by these important decisions.

For us there exists a commitment to a presence and resolute action on the Ibero-American continent both because of historical heritage and today's realities. We will strengthen our cooperation with this group of sister nations in all fields, with the conviction that an important part of our future is linked with this historical cooperation and coming together.

In the same way, we will pay special attention to our Mediterranean policy and our policy toward the Arab world and Africa because of their enormous potential from both the political and human points of view. To do this it will be necessary to combine the mechanisms of cooperation, especially in the cultural and technical fields, with the aim of developing a policy that is simultaneously realistic and effective.

Naturally, in these and all areas of the world it will be the government's constant concern to strengthen the interests of Spaniards abroad. We cannot forget the millions of fellow countrymen in distant places who work and struggle -- at times in a difficult and hostile environment -- to earn a living and to project Spain's presence in other lands. As the Constitution itself stipulates, the government will create the conditions for their return. In the meantime, the government will redouble its efforts to protect them through appropriate diplomatic steps, especially when there are grave and flagrant violations of the most basic human rights such as disappearances, arbitrary arrests or unjustified expulsions.

The government will reaffirm with all vigor its claim to Gibraltar, whose present colonial situation is an affront to the integrity of our national territory and discredits Spain's international and strategic position. The government therefore holds to its intention of reintegrating Gibraltar into the national territory through negotiations with the United Kingdom in accordance with UN resolutions.

In pursuing this as a priority axis in its policy, the government will act in such a way that neither the population of Gibraltar nor the population of Campo de Gibraltar will be penalized. The government will act in such a way that the final outcome of the negotiations will respect the legitimate interests of the population.

Having thus specified the scenarios and the main problems of our foreign policy in the immediate term, I should still recall our duty to participate in the great questions of interest for all people, such as peace, disarmament, human rights, freedom and the building of a new and more just economic order for the developing countries. Spain cannot be absent from this immense collective task -- on which the survival and progress of mankind literally depends -- if not as a protagonist then at least as a coparticipant in such a noble endeavor. At the international level, too, we must be inspired by solidarity among peoples; either we are saved together or we perish together. Spain must as soon as possible join the group of nations marching toward that common goal.

I would like to complete my examination of these large areas with an express reference to national defense. Our country's defense is a cornerstone of the pursuit of a foreign policy which will be respected as well as be respectable. The Constitution attributes to the armed forces the task of defending our territorial integrity and constitutional order, under orders from the legitimately constituted political authorities. The government will apply the election program it offered to the Spanish people, both in its social and economic aspects and also in the aspect of progressively adapting our operational deployment to the needs and duties which the Constitution accords to the armed forces.

I publicly proclaim our confidence in and solidarity with the armed forces, whose honorable mission has not been tarnished by the actions of minority groups. We are embarking on a new stage in Spain's political life with his majesty the king, whose role played for the sake of peace and freedom we all recognize. I wish to voice once again my faith in the future of Spain.

I also wish to express my profound conviction of the need to harmonize all the institutions of the state in order to allow us to develop in the future as a nation ever more free and independent. Through the government's actions, we will make whatever efforts are necessary to increase the professionalism and efficiency of those institutions that are basic to the state.

I thus reach the end of this summary of the whole panorama embraced by our plans for government and I should say again that what I have said has not been in any way an attempt to convey the fine points of the very detailed program we drew up for the elections. It might then be thought that the foregoing summary was unnecessary and for two reasons. The first would be the election publicity given to our program. As opposed to that, my sense of respect for the house made it incumbent on me to recapitulate at least the essentials of our plans.

The second reason deserves to be gone into a little deeper. The fact is that as I was preparing these words it struck me, as it may perhaps have struck you listening to me now, that some of the goals and even the instruments proposed might equally have issued from some other political position. Such a fact could be a source of satisfaction when it signalled similarities over such goals as improving the well-being or the efficiency of the administration. But such similarities do not prevent what we are proposing from being different at the same time, different in its very roots, as was grasped by those 10 million citizens who backed it with their confidence.

The uniqueness of what we are offering lies not so much in the wording of the details as in the way in which the programs are to be put into effect and the particular stress laid on certain aims as compared with others. This is what our people have grasped; that behind words that sound similar there sometimes lie policies which are quite different; people whose training and ideologies are different and who have had different vital experiences in the course of a political life which knew the harshness of repression, which consequently firmly reinforced their vocation to serve the people by holding high the banners of freedom, justice and human progress. In other words, the people of Spain have voted for change in the manner they believe to be the most effective possible by entrusting it to those who have for long been committed to an urge for renewal.

For all these reasons, because we feel the backing of a majority will and because we trust in the spirit of service to society which, even in the presence of differences moves those forces which represent other opinions, we feel ourselves encouraged by the brightest of hopes and we prepare to more forward toward a clear horizon by means of a realistic program.

I underline these final words because we have been accused of overstating our commitments. Those who think in that way are trusting only in material resources. We, in addition to taking due account of these, place our hope in the people, in the men and women who have just voted for change. That hope is well-founded. Geography can show us many countries with poor natural resources which have been able to develop through the efforts of men, as history itself shows us by the examples of the cities founded in America by a handful of Spaniards. That hope for the future is strengthened when we see the encouragement to be drawn especially from our young people, in whom the values of solidarity and freely-assumed commitment, which are of such importance for our common plans, are taking firm root. Those men, those women and those young people are our support. But they are also our judges. All of them must be seen in this chamber as a constant concern for us. To them I wish to dedicate my final words.

I like to imagine that down there in the center of the chamber a few citizens have come in from the street. I strain to see them, to get a look at them. Who are they? Perhaps a housewife on her way to the market, a bank clerk, a hotel porter or a university academic. Now I can see them and I ask myself: What do they think of us? Do they follow our debates? Do we fill them with hope or with disillusions? Are we doing the best for their future, which is that of our children? In order to understand my duty toward our people, I draw better inspiration from that simple vision than from the conventional lofty phrases. Peace, unity and progress: These things are of them and for them. Those words are of flesh and blood and are clothed in gestures. Let us trust in their hopeful and free participation, which is essential for success, and let us keep them in mind during our debates. I shall be daily thinking of them as I, looking faithfully to the horizon but also carefully at the road we are treading, go about my work of heading my government if indeed I earn the honor of now being granted the responsibility of investiture. Many thanks. [applause]

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS READY TO BREAK DEFENSE ACCORD

[Dan Axel report: "Anker Jorgensen Ready To Break Defense Agreement"]

[Text] The Danish Social Democratic Party is ready to break its defense agreement with the nonsocialist government parties if the government insists that Denmark contribute toward the cost of deployment of 572 nuclear missiles in Europe.

Former Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said that his party is opposed to the allocation of a total of 75 million kroner for the deployment of NATO's Pershing II and cruise missiles. The first installment of 15.5 million kroner is to be discussed by the Folketing Finance Committee shortly, but the Social Democrats, the Socialist People's Party and the Radical Liberals will vote against it -- and the government will find itself in the minority.

On Friday [26 November], the Folketing will debate for the first time a proposal from the Socialist People's Party and the Left Socialist Party that Denmark's contributions to the NATO infrastructure program be suspended. The proposal is expected to win the support of both the Social Democrats and Radical Liberals.

Former Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that the Social Democratic Folketing group has yet to decide how it will vote on the proposal. The group is meeting today to discuss the matter.

"Denmark should not take the lead in a new arms race," Knud Damgaard (Social Democrat) said. "The deployment of the NATO missiles is not necessary to preserve the nuclear arms balance, for in this area the West is still superior. At the same time we have noted that things are now beginning to move. So a few missiles should not be allowed to stand in the way of nuclear-free zones down through Europe."

Prime Minister Poul Schulter was unwilling to comment on whether a violation of present defense policy would be an issue which could lead to the fall of the government. "I think it is deeply regrettable that the Social Democrats are now prepared to pursue foreign and security policy in conjunction with the Socialist People's Party and the Left Socialist Party," Poul Schulter said.

Yesterday, Defense Minister Hans Engell stated that Denmark has already paid 4.8 million kroner toward working to build sites for the missiles. Engell intends to produce a short report making it clear how the whole of NATO's infrastructure program works and how payments to it are made.

REAGAN, ANDROPOV SHOW CAUTION ON RELATIONS

[Editorial: "Sizing Each Other Up"]

[Text] It was hardly to be expected that the Soviet Union's and the United States' leaders would embrace each other in their first major political exchanges since the power exchange in Moscow, and no one could claim that they have done so.

General Secretary Andropov and President Reagan followed the same pattern in their speeches: They declared their willingness to further negotiate, aiming at far-reaching reciprocal reductions in the strategic balance of power, but they both gave an assurance that -- before a negotiated settlement has been reached -- they will do everything necessary to safeguard their own military strength.

Reagan played the trump card with his decision to renew the U.S. strike force by introducing the first 100 MX missiles and deploying them in reinforced silos in Wyoming. They are to replace the older generation of intercontinental missiles and will be in place toward the end of the present decade. They are a very expensive part of Reagan's defense program, and the decision to implement the project will initially be a challenge to the U.S. Congress. The President is obviously risking all his political authority on having the decision approved, boldly confident that he will get his way with the newly-elected Congress when he confronts it on a single important issue. It is the pattern from the NATO dual decision on missiles in Europe he will follow: He wants to have the MX missiles in reserve while he negotiates the terms for a strategic balance of power at a lower level. If he does not win the support of Congress, he will, in his own view, stand weakened in the further negotiations with the Soviet Union.

Andropov played no trumps in his speech to the Central Committee. He did not use the militant tone adopted by President Brezhnev in his last two speeches. But this does not mean, of course, that the clear message of Soviet defense reinforcements contained in Brezhnev's speeches will not be put into practice. Andropov does not have the problems with the Supreme Soviet that Reagan has with Congress. His main theme was making the Soviet economy more efficient. The international section of his speech was a balanced statement of a Soviet desire for cooperation on all sides. He closed no doors, but he did not open them very far either. Together the two speeches show only that the superpowers are cautious in their relations with each other in the present situation. Reagan admitted that the Soviet Union helped to get the Geneva negotiations moving in the right direction. Andropov said that there cannot be something for nothing if the current talks are to achieve some results. There is room for dialogue at a higher level, and there will probably also be much need and an opportunity for it in the new year.

KREMLIN'S NEW TREND SOURCE FOR MORE DIALOGUE

PM301455 Stockholm STOCKHOLMSTIDNINGEN in Swedish 23 Nov 82 p 42

[Editorial: "How Will Reagan Respond?"]

[Text] The transfer of power in Moscow following Brezhnev's death is being used by the Soviet Union to break, if possible, the deadlock which has left its mark on the international scene in the last few years. The discussions with China -- whatever may now come of them after the sudden replacement of the Chinese foreign minister -- and the repeated attempts to reach the U.S. Adminsitration for a dialogue are an expression of this. Soviet First Deputy Foreign Minister Georgiy Korniyenko has gone farthest in an article in NEWSWEEK. Korniyenko was one of the leading Soviet negotiators involved in the SALT II treaty. He has now said that the Soviet Union is ready to go a step further: instead of a 10-percent reduction in strategic nuclear arms fixed by SALT II, a 25-percent reduction should be possible. President Carter never succeeded in persuading Congress to ratify the agreement, and his successor has hardly shown any active desire to make any other than verbal attempts to restore the atmosphere of understanding and disarmament with the Soviet Union. Maybe Ronald Reagan will react according to the same primitive pattern this time as well -- but we take the view that the new situation in the Kremlin also opens up new opportunities for the United States. A positive stated desire to seriously test the new attitudes from the Soviet Union would increase confidence in the United States and Ronald Reagan. This could be needed.

DEFENSE SECRETARY COMMENTS ON MISSILES IN EUROPE

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Defence Secretary Mr John Nott today advised the Russians to dismantle their own nuclear warheads if they felt genuinely threatened by Europe's latest missiles. He described as "unscrupulous propaganda" Soviet warnings that the planned deployment of cruise and Pershing-2 missiles in the West next year would raise the chances of nuclear warfare. Europe had to protect itself against Soviet nuclear weapons and the need had to be explained to Europe's anti-nuclear movements, Mr Nott said, after a meeting of NATO defence ministers in Brussels.

Neither Europe nor the USA would ever contemplate the "launching on warning" of their nuclear missiles, as reports today by the Soviet news agency NOVOSTI, claimed that Russia would now be prepared to do. "This threat by the Russians is clearly evidence of the utterly unscrupulous propaganda they will use on every occasion to try and twist any argument around," said Mr Nott. "The Soviets have already deployed more than 900 SS-20 warheads which threaten the West now. We have no similar weapons deployed at all and therefore what they described as a threat to them is in fact a threat that we have faced for a very long period. In fact we don't have any policy of launch on warning. The West would never do that."

Mr Nott said the deployment of Pershing and cruise missiles was on target, with 160 cruise weapons destined to be deployed in Britain by December next year. "There is no way these weapons, when they are deployed, would be used for launching on warning. But if that is the Russians' genuine fear, instead of their normal kind of propaganda, they have the zero-option proposals of the West and they are free to dismantle their SS-20s in which case the deployment would not take place." He said the need for nuclear missiles capable of reaching targets within a few minutes had to be explained to the anti-nuclear movements. "We must bring home to people that this kind of propaganda by the Russians simply serves to ensure that we would not achieve the same protection as they have." But Mr Nott emphasised that Europe's intention was to limit its nuclear capability to what was required to ensure the prevention of nuclear war. "We want to keep the volume of nuclear weapons at the lowest level for deterrence," he said.

Europe's nuclear deployment plans involve the siting of 464 cruise missiles -- 160 in Britain, 112 in Italy, 96 in West Germany and 48 each in Belgium and Holland. In addition 108 Pershing-2 weapons are due to be deployed in West Germany.

PAPER CRITICIZES USSR'S POLICY ON CYPRUS ISSUE

NC010841 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 1 Dec 82 p 2

[From the Positions column: "Nonexistent Problem"]

[Text] It was not a surprise that TASS did not mention the Cyprus issue among the international issues discussed between the Soviet and the Turkish foreign ministers.

After the numerous statements and the many articles by the Soviet information media on the Cyprus issue, like: "We consider the Cyprus issue an open wound" and others, one would expect the Soviet foreign minister not to miss the opportunity to indicate to his Turkish counterpart that it was time for Turkey to contribute toward the healing of the open wound. Not that it was expected that the Soviet foreign minister would ask the Turkish foreign minister to withdraw the Turkish occupation troops from Cyprus, because this was not brought up during Mr Kiprianou's regular visit to the Soviet Union. However, the Cyprus issue should have been discussed, as Turkey is part of the problem.

However, it appears that the Soviet Union, like Turkey, does not consider the Cyprus issue a problem.

SPOKESMAN REJECTS ARCHBISHOP'S ALLEGATIONS

NC302002 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] In a statement that was issued today the government spokesman replied to Archbishop Khrisostomos' speech of yesterday. The full text of the statement is as follows:

In a speech he made yesterday, Archbishop Khrisostomos speaks of falsification in the Cyprus struggle and transformation of our national cause into a commercial transaction. These allegations by the prelate of the Cypriot church of course have no connection with reality and constitute an invective for the country's leadership and for the vast majority of our people. These unacceptable descriptions by the archbishop refer to the conduct of the intercommunal talks. The archbishop interprets this procedure as a commercial transaction and a falsification of the struggle. This is an entirely deceptive interpretation, because while we are trying to find a solution to the internal aspects of the Cyprus issue through the intercommunal talks, at the same time we do not stop publicizing internationally in all cases the nature of the Cyprus issue as a specific issue of occupation of Cypriot territory by Turkey and stressing the need for the withdrawal of the occupation troops and the return of the refugees to their homes.

With the new statement by the archbishop, the reasonable question again arises: Why does the archbishop consider it expedient to launch his thunderbolts against the discussion of the territorial aspect at this time, whereas he had kept silent in the past when Ethnarch Makarios was following exactly the same procedure? Was it not during Ethnarch Makarios' time and with his approval that the Greek Cypriot side submitted proposals for the territorial aspect accompanied by a map showing the percentages of the territories that would come under Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot administration in case of agreement? What did the current archbishop say publicly at the time? And were not most Cypriot political leaders, who currently want to appear as opponents of the talks, approving of and participating in this commercial transaction -- as Archbishop Khrisostomos currently calls it?

The archbishop's conclusion that the Greek Cypriot side is giving the impression that it has accepted the faits accomplis is arbitrary and dangerous.

Not only we have not accepted the faits accomplis but we are waging a struggle for their abolition and faits accomplis certainly are not abolished through rhetoric and hollow sloganeering but through systematic and coordinated efforts and this is precisely what the government is doing.

With his innuendoes that we have accepted the faits accomplis, the archbishop is essentially assailing the Cypriot people's struggle because he is encouraging the Turkish side's intransigent stance. When we ourselves are attributing such unacceptable intentions to the government, the Turkish conquerors certainly draw the appropriate conclusions and behave accordingly.

KIPRIANOU, PAPAIOANNOU SPEAK AT DIKO-AKEL RALLY

NC281947 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 28 Nov 82

[Text] A pan-Cypriot rally of the Democratic Party [DIKO]-AKEL Democratic Cooperation was held in Nicosia today. The cooperation's candidate for the presidency of the republic in the forthcoming elections and president of the republic and DIKO chairman, Mr Kiprianou, and AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou spoke at the rally.

In his speech, President Kiprianou declared that we do not intend to reconcile our differences under any conditions and stressed that we accept neither partition nor faits accomplis. He also stressed that a solution to the Cyprus problem without the safeguarding of the right of the refugees to return to their paternal homes is inconceivable. President Kiprianou stated that the efforts to get Attila to leave Cyprus and to achieve an honorable and viable solution in accordance with the UN resolutions and the summit agreements will be intensified. President Kiprianou stated that the democratic Cooperation's conviction is that with the alignment of democratic Greece, the Greek Government, politicians and Greeks throughout the world and with the continuously broadening international support, we will be able to secure our rights.

President Kiprianou expressed admiration for the enclaved people's forbearing and then referred to the problem of the missing persons. He stressed that the efforts to determine their fate will continue despite Turkey's negative stance on this matter.

Referring to the Democratic Cooperation, President Kiprianou stated that its positions are clear and explicit and were presented with frankness and honesty to the people. He said: Two parties with differing philosophies decided to cooperate, with the salvation of the country as their joint goal. President Kiprianou concluded: In today's rally the people are deciding for democracy and a true and responsible struggle for freedom and for restoration of their rights. The people have decided that they do not intend to bend nor will they allow new treacheries or the creation of prerequisites for new destructive actions.

In addressing the rally, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou stated that the Democratic Cooperation's minimum program is neither a subjugation of DIKO to AKEL nor of AKEL to DIKO. Mr Papaioannou said: On the basis of the minimum program we are cooperating for Cyprus' salvation and for the opening of the road for the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation and all other foreign troops from the territory of Cyprus, for the determination of the fate of the missing persons, for the return of the refugees to their homes and their property and for the solution of the Cyprus issue based on the UN resolutions and summit agreements.

The AKEL secretary general also stated that the issue of a socialist transformation of Cyprus under existing conditions is out of the question.

He said: We must first liberate Cyprus from the Turkish occupation and the imperialist presence and interference in our domestic issues, and then prepare programs for the socialist transformation of society for the approval of the people. Mr Papaioannou said: AKEL and DIKO belong to two different ideological camps. Each party maintains its complete independence and identity. He added: What both parties have undertaken to implement is included in the minimum program. Mr Papaioannou finally stated that it is the inalienable right of each party to maintain its own ideological-political orientation and even to take a different stand, if it deems it expedient, on matters not agreed upon.

PAPER QUESTIONS NORTH'S DEPENDENCE ON TURKEY

NC300955 Nicosia YENI DUZEN in Turkish 23 Nov 82 p 3

[Article by Ozker Ozgur: "Dependence and Independence"]

[Excerpts] Honorable Cosar, minister of finance, stated at a press conference on 7 November: "In our search for a solution to our economic, financial and social problems it is impossible for us to act separately and independently."

The finance minister is openly saying that in his search for solutions to the problems of the TFSC he cannot act separately and independently of Turkey. By using the term "impossible", the finance minister gives the impression that the government's hands are tied. If the image created by the minister is true, then the future of the TFSC, which has been founded to form a basis for an "independent federal Cyprus republic" is not very encouraging. If it cannot act independently in resolving its problems, although 8 years have elapsed since its inception, the matter should be reviewed seriously.

The Turkish Republic extends aid, grants credits and finances TFSC projects. It also covers deficits in its budget. From this angle, relations between the Turkish Republic and the TFSC are unavoidable. They are essential. But when we stop to remember the aim of the establishment of the TFSC, the term "impossible" as expressed by the minister emerges as an anxiety-causing concept.

All past governments have failed to properly exploit the economic possibilites after 1974. They have squandered millions of pounds worth of found (buluntu) property. They have created a small class of millionaires. Then they set out for Ankara to say: "We have no money; our budget is in deficit; we are unable to pay the government employees."

The Turkish Republic constructed roads and bridges in the TFSC. It has built its harbors and paid its soldiers. But despite all this, the National Unity Party (NUP) has failed to salvage the economy of the TFSC. The credits granted and the aid extended have proved of no avail.

Under the circumstances, can the TFSC become a dignified partner in the federal republic to be founded? Starting with the frequently repeated literature of "fatherland" and "young fatherland" [Turkey and TFSC respectively] we are tempted to ask: "When will the father allow the young man to acquire his own personality?" or, "When and how can the young man prove that he has come of age?"

There is not a single Turkish Cypriot who does not love Turkey and its people. But it is our patriotic duty to accentuate the difference between loyalty to Turkey and its people and the TFSC's dependence on the Turkish Republic. If we are going to be a dignified partner in an independent Cyprus federal republic, we have to see that the TFSC acquires personality. Our dignified community deserves a dignified administration.

CAGATAY DISCUSSES PROBLEMS WITH GREEK CYPRIOTS

TA301648 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Greek Cypriot citizens living in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus have stressed that they have no problems. During a conversation Prime Minister Cagatay held with the Greek Cypriot citizens in Sipahi [Ayia Trias] village yesterday, a spokesman for the Greek Cypriot citizens thanked the prime minister for the state's attention. When the prime minister asked them if they had any problems, the Greek Cypriot citizens said that they had no problems and that they were happy with the administration of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

Meanwhile, the prime minister also visited Dipkarpas [Rizokarpasso] and Yeni Erenkoy [Yialoussa] and listened to their villagers' requests and complaints. In a speech he delivered there, Cagatay said: In these lands which are now ours, we will have a bright and happy future by loving and respecting each other and by working harder than ever.

NORTH DEPLORES MARKING OF DISASTER ANNIVERSARY

TA011221 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot [word indistinct] has reacted bitterly to reports that the Greek Cypriot municipality of Nicosia was organizing a demonstration on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the so-called Asia Minor disaster. The Turkish Cypriot news agency TAK quotes an official of the federated state as saying that the so-called Asia Minor disaster was connected with Greek attacks on Asia Minor with the encouragement of the British Empire with the aim of destroying the Turkish nation. The official said that to describe this as a disaster, to begin commemorating it after 60 years and to declare it similar to Palestine and the Cyprus problem as prime minister Mr Papandreau was doing (?clarified) the true aims, thoughts and policies of the Greeks and Greek Cypriots. He stressed that such thoughts and actions by a country and people were demoralizing for those who were searching for peace in Cyprus.

PAPANDREOU SPEAKS TO JOURNALISTS ON NATO MEETING

NC302250 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] During the press interview he gave to Greek journalists in Brussels, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou described Greece's reservations on today's final communique by the NATO defense planning committee as general and complete. In addition, Papandreou will tomorrow, on the first day of the alliance's defense ministers meeting, expound Greek positions in connection with our country's relations with Turkey and NATO. Our correspondent in Brussels Thanos Oikonomopoulos reports:

[Begin recording] Today Greece expressed a general reservation on the joint communique of the NATO nuclear planning committee which convened today only one day before the 2-day meeting of the alliance's defense ministers, which begins tomorrow here in Brussels. Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou, who arrived in the Belgian capital this afternoon, will represent our country at this meeting in his capacity as defense minister. Greece's general reservations on the entire communique are noted at the end of the text, whereas all our country's views on the basis of the government's declared principles [passage indistinct] for the aggregate of the issues of nuclear planning that were discussed were included in the minutes. It should be noted that NATO Secretary General Luns, in a statement to journalists, strangely claimed that Greece did not reject the entire communique but only expressed certain viewpoints.

Commenting on Luns' claim in a talk with Greek journalists, Papandreou said: Luns will do well to let the Greeks speak for their policy. Reservations were general and our positions have both consistency and continuity through our policy in support of detente, peace and disarmament. After putting forth in detail the Greek Government's positions which as he said reflect the feelings of all the Greek people, Papandreou stressed that Greece now has a viewpoint, something that the alliance was not accustomed to, and that was time it did. Informing the journalists on the stance he will maintain tomorrow at the NATO defense ministers meeting, Papandreou concluded: This viewpoint constitutes our nation's shield. It is politically viable, it has a voice and value and it plays a role in the formation of relations. Without bluffing or extorting it has specific positions which it supports consistently and continuously.

At tomorrow's first day of the meeting Papandreou will put forth Greek positions as regards our country's relations with Turkey and NATO. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT REBUFFS TURKS' REPLY ON VIOLATIONS

NC301937 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Today the Greek Government presented its counterreply to the Turk's reply to the Greek protest against the mass violations of 25 November through Deputy Foreign Minister Kapsis to Turkish Ambassador Alacam.

The counterreply stresses that no explanations are given for the specific violations mentioned. Due to the Greek Government's timely warning to the Turkish ambassador, it was known beyond any shadow of a doubt where such violations could lead. This proves that the Turkish Government was the one which not only provoked but also strove for cancellation of the foreign ministers meeting in Brussels.

The Greek Government is obliged to recall with regret that similar tactics were followed by Turkey in the recent past. Specifically, on 8 April 1981, immediately after the meeting of the secretaries general of the two countries' foreign ministries and prior to the meeting of the two foreign ministers in Rome, Turkish aircraft violated Greek airspace repeatedly during Turkish exercises.

In March 1982, when for the first time Greece made the proposal for an agreed moratorium, repeated violations of our airspace by Turkish aircraft again took place. Immediately after the NATO summit conference, where the moratorium proposal was made official, there were further numerous violations, specifically in June 1982.

The Greek Government, which is interested in peace and in the prosperity of the area's peoples, notes with surprise and regret the admission of the Turkish side that the Turkish Government never fostered any hopes that the imminent meeting of the two foreign ministers would have basic results.

KAPSIS REPLIES TO ULUSU STATEMENT ON AEGEAN

NC010946 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 30 Nov 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] The question of using the island of Limnos in NATO maneuvers and the violations of Greek airspace will be raised by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou at the NATO defense minister's conference which starts in Brussels tomorrow.

Replying to Saturday's statement by Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu to the Consultative Assembly on the question of the militarization of the Aegean islands, Deputy Foreign Minister Ioannis Kapsis made the following statement:

"Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu's statement must, most certainly, have convinced the very few -- if they exist at all -- who have doubts about Turkey's expansionist intentions. This was the only important element this statement contained, because allegations on the issue are evidently unfounded, specifically because:

"1 -- Defense of the Aegean islands is based on a UN resolution which recognizes the absolute right of member states to organize the defense of their territories and it represents implementation of our sovereign rights.

"2 -- It is tragicomic for Turkey to allege that it is threatened by the defense of our islands at a time when the Fourth Army of the Aegean with a strength of 140,000 men is deployed on the opposite shores and is maintained with NATO funds in order to threaten Greece.

"3 -- In an effort to dispel any doubts about the role of this army, 79 large landing-craft are stationed along the shore opposite our islands.

"Is Ulusu trying to convince us that these strong forces feel threatened by the garrisons on our islands?"

PAPER SCORES LACK OF GOVERNMENT NATIONAL POLICY

NC011045 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 30 Nov 82 pp 1, 9

[Editorial: "The Government and National Affairs"]

[Text] We Greeks are always ready to stand united behind any of our governments on national issues, but under two conditions: That the government serves the nation and that it does so in a lucid and crystal-clear manner.

We do not wish to question fulfillment of the first condition by the present government, but we are nevertheless unable to understand what exactly its policy is on national affairs and more specifically on the Greek-Turkish issue.

Prior to the election, PASOK held extreme positions: "No dialogue with Turkey" and "Sink the Hora [Turkish seismographic vessel]."

In its position as the government it has made a complete turnabout. Its leader has spoken about an "olive branch" and about "a new era in Greek-Turkish relations." Yet this "new era" has been marked by an intensification of Turkish aggressiveness.

What has the government done? Has it sunk [the Hora], has it shot anything down and so forth? It has done nothing of the kind. It has demonstrated unheard-of tolerance and has described the Turkish provocations as "simple infractions" and "harmless crossing."

Suddenly, while onboard the aircraft on which he was returning from some visit, the prime minister suffered an attack of national wrath as a result of some Turkish violation -- one of many, neither larger than previous ones nor smaller than the ones which have followed. Why this turnabout? This remains unknown.

A crisis was created and then, another turnabout -- toward dialogue this time! The "moratorium" was its preamble. This meant abstention from any provocation by both sides. Since we did not provoke, they interpreted our prospecting for oil in the Aegean as a provocation. Instead of sinking the Turkish "Horas" we transported our own into the Ionian Sea.

This was done for the sake of dialogue, but dialogue on what? The government proclaims -- erroneously -- that "we ask for absolutely nothing from Turkey." Consequently there are no demands on our part to be discussed. At the same time it also proclaims -- this time correctly -- that "we are not going to give up any of our rights on air, land, sea or undersea space." Consequently, we reject Turkish claims in advance. What, therefore, would we be saying in a dialogue? This remains unknown.

Then we had Limmos, well, not exactly, because this is a very old issue. Turkey wants the island demilitarized. No Greek Government has ever taken this demand into consideration, and Limmos is excellently fortified. The present government, however, had given new dimensions to the issue, excessive and somewhat hysterical ones. It could be argued that it was the government itself which created the issue with its own actions. Why? This remains unknown. The only result was that we contributed to the creation of a climate in the Western world and its organizations which is unfavorable to our own positions.

In conclusion, we had the new crisis arising from the Turkish exercise and the wreck of the dialogue -- before it hardly had chance to get started. There is no question about the handling of Turkish provocativeness: We stand behind any Greek Government but at the same time we believe that all of us Greeks have the legal right to know which, at long last, is the government's policy on this issue. Is it dynamic repulsing of the violations or tolerance in the face of them? Is it dialogue or is it not? Is it concessions or not? What will we have to discuss in case of a dialogue? Are we asking for guarantees of our eastern frontiers or are we not? Are we asking for preservation of the 7-10 ratio or are we not? We want to know, because the government is continually changing its position on all of these issues.

The question of dealing with Turkish provocativeness is a serious one. It is for this reason that amateurism is impermissible. Nor is there any room for empty sloganeering or for the linking of this issue to the requirements for domestic or party policy. Our tactics toward Ankara must be established on the basis of a national strategy, the preparation of which cannot depend on a single party, because this requires all-national consent and because although preparation of such a strategy is the governments responsibility, it is also the responsibility of all other representative factors of our regime and our national affairs.

DEFENSE MINISTER DESCRIBES MEMORANDUM WITH U.S.

TA301642 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken has said that with the signing of the memorandum of understanding between Turkey and the United States in Brussels yesterday, Turkey's deterrent force would increase and its defense would be strengthened. Bayulken, who is in Brussels for the NATO defense ministers' meetings, made a statement to Turkish Radio and Television recalling that NATO infrastructure funds have supplied numerous installations to Turkey in the past. He added that with this latest memorandum, some of the airports in Turkey would be modernized. In this way, he said, in a crisis or armed confrontation within the NATO area or according to NATO plans, the reinforcements to be sent to the wings and to Turkey would be received easily. Bayulken pointed out that the memorandum with the United States was part of the activities aimed at strengthening Turkey's deterrent force and, in case of a confrontation, its defense.

MILLIYET CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU POLICIES

[Editorial by Mehmet Barlas: "What Is Happening in Athens?"]

[Text] As Turkey's extraordinary geopolitical position increases in importance, the country's problems also seem to be increasing proportionately. Turkey is not only at the junction of continents. It is also at the junction of regimes, religions and civilizations. The axis which stretches from the Balkans to the Middle East marks the most critical region in world politics.

To avoid this geopolitical confusion, Turkey has in the republican era chosen to implement the principle of "peace at home, peace abroad." The traditional animosities inherited from the Ottoman Empire have thus been converted into deeply rooted friendships. We are trying to explain this through such association of ideas as "Ataturk-Lenin" and "Ataturk-Venizelos." But unfortunately, Turkey's political direction cannot be the only factor determining our foreign policy. The changes in the domestic policies of the neighboring countries, on the one hand, and the changes in the basic lines of international politics, on the other, from time to time adversely influence Turkey's diplomatic goals.

For example, at this moment there is tension in Turkish-Greek relations which has shaken the friendship between the two countries and cast a shadow on the region's stability. Neither the Greek people not the Greek state is responsible for the Turkish-Greek tension.... Like every nation, the Greeks favor peace and head of state President Karamanlis is the architect of Turkish-Greek friendship. But, Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou is the kind of person who camouflages his failures in domestic politics through demagogic endeavors in foreign politics. Papandreou has denied all the foreign agreements Greece signed during Karamanlis' term in office [as prime minister]. This situation disturbs Turkey, and the same can be said about the EEC and the United States. This unfortunate situation in which Greece has fallen has not affected Turkey's peaceful intentions nor its determined stand in support of stability in the region. We know that it is not adventurers like Papandreou, but statesmen of stature who will convert the Aegean into a sea of lasting peace and cooperation.

Let us remember this: Through his behavior, Papandreou, who is a product of democracy, is disturbing the internal equilibrium of Greece and at the same time could contribute negatively to the democratic transition period in Turkey, because normal regimes come into being and survive only under peaceful conditions.

The group of refugees had flown to the Spanish capital from Istanbul via Vienna on Friday, but its petition for political asylum was not accepted by the authorities there.

In the meantime, the seven people have been put up at a pension in Vienna-Josefstadt. They now say they now want to apply for political asylum in Austria.

HERNU DEFENDS NUCLEAR DETERRENCE IN WEU SPEECH

NC302208 Paris AFP in English 2157 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Paris, Nov 30 (AFP) -- Abandoning nuclear weapons could mean either "war or slavery" for Western Europe, Defence Minister Charles Hernu said here today.

Europeans, he told the Western European Union (WEU) assembly here, all well aware that any future war will be a "holocaust."

"So our aim," he said, "is to prevent war, and only the nuclear deterrent is in a position to ensure that."

The French defence effort would not slacken, he said. France would maintain its ability to fulfill "its commitments toward its allies and friends in Europe and in the world."

Independence could not stem from "isolation and neutrality," he said.

Defending the theory of nuclear deterrence, Mr Henru said that even a so-called conventional war would lead inevitably to nuclear conflict.

"France's effort in maintaining peace in Europe," he said, "is firstly manifested by the existence of the French deterrent force, which singularly reduces the risks of aggression against the European states."

GREEK-TURKEY ISSUES DISCUSSED AT NATO MEETING

Bayulken Meets Weinberger

TA011032 Ankara Domestic Serivce in Turkish 1000 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken, who is in Brussels to attend the NATO meetings, has met with U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger. According to information provided by a Turkish radio and television crew in Brussels, defense and military cooperation issues between the two countries were discussed at the meeting which was held at the U.S. representation at NATO headquarters. It is reported that at the meeting Bayulken stressed that the military aid to Turkey should be increased and that Weinberger said that his country is doing all it can on the issue and that it will continue to do so. It is also reported that Bayulken also drew attention to Greece's behavior and attitude aimed at creating artificial tension and pursuing a dangerous policy of adventurism.

The modernization of tanks, aircraft renovation activities and the development of helicopter capabilities within the framework of military cooperation were also discussed at the meeting held between Bayulken and Weinberger.

Bayulken is expected to meet with the FRG and British defense ministers today.

Bayulken Addresses Meeting

TA011658 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Speaking at the NATO Defense Planning Committee meeting in Brussels today, our national defense minister said that the Greek prime minister is trying to create an atmosphere of continuous and planned conflict with Turkey and NATO, and that these moves are motivated by a definite goal. NATO sources report that in his statement, Bayulken said that Greece is trying to include the Aegean sea and Aegean airspace, including the open seas, within Greek sovereignty and to annex them to Greek territory. Noting that the Greek request for guarantees from NATO and the United States against a so-called Turkish threat is meaningless, Bayulken added that Papandreou does not hesitate to resort to blackmail in order to conceal his real intentions.

It is reported that Bayulken also said in his statement, that the Turkish Air Force had not violated Greek airspace because Turkey had never accepted the Greek claim to a 10-mile airspace and had said so on various occasions. It has also been learned that Bayulken said that international laws regarding the Aegean and international agreements cannot be amended through unilateral statements and that it is wrong to bring bilateral disputes to NATO. Bayulken also said that if the Greek prime minister is sincere about his statement on negotiations, Turkey will welcome it.

It has been learned that the Greek delegation circulated a brochure on the allegations in question while Bayulken was addressing the NATO Defense Planning Committee meeting. Diplomatic sources in Brussels said that NATO military officials later replied to Papandreou's statements at the meeting and that Papandreou's statement was unfavorably received by NATO circles.

Papandreou Speaks

NC012017 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou militantly expounded Greece's positions on the issue of the country's relations with Turkey and NATO during today's meeting of the Atlantic alliance defense ministers which began in Brussels this morning.

In this connection, Greek radio-television correspondent Thanos Oikonomopoulos reports:

[Begin recording] The presentation and placing of the crystal-clear Greek positions regarding relations with NATO and Turkey by Prime Minister and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou constituted the only issue today in the first closed-door meeting of the NATO defense ministers here in Brussels. Specifically, what did the prime minister make absolutely clear to the alliance?

1. Our country is not prepared to establish the Larisa headquarters if the limits of responsibility are not clearly and precisely defined before hand.

2. Our country is not willing to participate in allied exercises that dispute uncontestable national sovereign rights.

3. The issue of the provocative Turkish violations, which were proven here at the defense ministers meeting through maps and a detailed list, as well as our country's right to be responsible for the defense of its land, sea and airspace, as in the case of Limnos, to which the prime minister referred in detail and actually circulated a special document.

The alliance listened to these Greek Government positions with great attention.

[Passage indistinct] With absolutely documented positions, especially on the issue of Limnos and the provocative Turkish violations, Papandreou presented the entire range of Greek-NATO and Greek-Turkish problems to the alliance without leaving space for spectacular manifestations on Turkey's part. Characteristically, Turkish Defense Minister Bayulken replied only to the issues of the 10-mile limit, national airspace and the moratorium, while in all other issues -- the Larisa headquarters, the cancellation of the Apex-Express exercise because of Limnos, Turkish violations and so forth -- [words indistinct] was principally undertaken by U.S. Supreme Commander of the NATO Allied Forces General Rogers.

When Papandreou raised the issue of nonparticipation by the Greek forces in allied exercises in the Aegean, General Rogers admitted that there is a problem and affirmed that he does not intend to undertake initiatives for NATO exercises in the area. Regarding the Turkish violations, Rogers claimed that Greek radar may have erred and that in any case, General Evren had assured him that no violations had taken place, at least on orders. Even after the detailed presentation by the Greek side of the map and long list in which one by one all Turkish violations that have taken place were marked, Turkish Minister Bayulken, obviously vexed, did not reply.

Papandreou unequivocally asked Bavulken to explain how and why Turkey, which agreed to the moratorium, carried out the mass violations only 2 weeks before the meeting scheduled between Kharalambopoulos and Turkmen on 9 December in Brussels: Something which proves that the Turks did not want to hold the meeting or wanted it to take place but in a state of pressure. But the Turkish defense minister did not reply. He only said that Greece engages in aggressive rhetoric against Turkey and fortifies its islands at a time when Ankara has friendly intentions toward it. At this point, the Greek prime minister reiterated that the garrisons on the islands are purely defensive, as every government has the right to defend its national territory, and asked Bayulken why the omnipotent Aegean Army is deployed along the Turkish coast in the Aegean and not along the Black Sea.

As regards Ankara's friendly intentions, Papandreou recalled that for 8 years now Ankara has militarily occupied 36.4 percent of Cyprus.

Bayulken attempted to create a sensation by saying that Greece has no right to have a 10-mile national airspace but only a 6-mile one. However, before the alliance, Papandreou reminded the Turkish minister that for many years there has been a Greek law recognizing the 10-mile limit, which Turkey never disputed until 1974. The prime minister asked the Turkish defense minister whether Turkey would prefer that Greece extend -- as it can on the basis of international law -- its territorial waters and airspace to 12 miles. Naturally, the Turkish minister did not reply to this question.

On the issue of Limnos, on which the Greek delegation circulated a special text in which the correctness of the Greek positions is clearly proven on the basis of international treaties, both General Rogers and Luns apologized for the alliance's error in losing the document containing the Greek positions, something that led to the cancellation of the Apex-Express 82 exercise.

Essentially, with these positions Papandreou made it clear that unless these problems are solved, Greece, because of the state of affairs, will not fully implement the agreement for its return into the NATO military wing -- the Larisa headquarters, participation in exercises and so forth -- and that there exists the issue of our country's security, which NATO cannot guarantee. [end recording]

Addresses Greek Newsmen

NC012210 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Statement by Greek Prime Minster and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou to Greek newsmen following the 1 December NATO defense ministers meeting in Brussels -- recorded]

[Text] It is difficult in 2 or 3 minutes for one to sum up the events of an entire day, but I would like to convey to you the climate and the conclusion which, I think, are very important. Today, Greece had the opportunity to actually be the first and only issue at the closed meeting of NATO defense ministers. First, we had the opportunity to explain in length the reason Greece cannot establish the Larisa command when the question of zone responsibility for this command has not been clarified, when it is not clear that within the NATO framework Greece has both the rights and the duty to defend from the air its airspace in the Aegean, all its islands and the land and sea region which are Greek.

Second, I had the opportunity to present and discuss the major issue of the Apex-Express 82 exercise in which Limnos was not included because -- Greece's message, which was sent on 13 September, did not reach General Rogers. I must stress that it has been admitted that this is, indeed, proof of some internal weakness in NATO. This has been admitted by Luns, by Rogers and by (Thors), the Canadian who heads the military committee.

Third, we discussed the moratorium. I explained the basic question, which the Turkish side was unable to answer. I explained how, although this summer, since June when the agreement on the moratorium was reached, there have been violations and infringements -- not by fighter planes -- which have been of secondary importance, and indeed of secondary importance, precisely 2 and 1/2 weeks prior to the meeting of Mr Kharalambopoulos with Mr Turkmen on 9 December in Brussels there was a mass violation and infringement of Greece's sovereign national space, of the sovereignty of our country, not only less than 10 miles, not only less than 6 miles but even over islands, such as Psara.

If I am not mistaken, there were 23 violations and infringements within 2 days. I have sought an explanation. The only thing that Turkey said in reply was that there were no violations or infringements. Then we distributed a printed document showing the violations and infringements and a chart showing the violations and infringements, and in view of this document, Turkey reserved its reply for the future.

Therefore, I must say that today we indeed had the opportunity to present our national question, the Aegean question, not abstractly and in a general way but within the framework -- the concrete framework -- of the Turkish provocations and aggressiveness, on the one hand, and of the condonation by the Atlantic alliance of these violations and infrincements, on the other. Of course, the question of exercises in the Aegean was more generally raised and it became absolutely clear that Greece cannot participate in exercises that create faits accomplis and precedents at the expense of its national sovereignty.

General Rogers -- of course I have no right to go into details -- maintained that within the NATO framework it is not possible to solve a bilateral question between two NATO countries. But of course I replied to him that because of the way in which the exercises are planned, the bilateral questions are indeed solved at the expense of Greece.

I can say without any exaggeration that this time we achieved something which we did not achieve last year. For the first time the allies, the attending defense ministers, heard at close quarters about the Aegean problem, Turkey's role and Greece's role. And I can say that the Greek position has been decisively strengthened and that today's showdown is a major step in the course for the consolidation of our country's national sovereignty in the Aegean. I think I cannot say more right now. I thank you for listening to me. [end recording]

Rejects Turkish Proposal

NC012104 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] A short while ago our political editor Thanos Oikonomopoulos phoned us from Brussels on the following developments.

Following Papandreou's positon on the problem that has been created concerning the moratorium, Turkish Minister Bayulken came forward with a diplomatic counteroffensive, proposing that the meeting between Kharalambopoulos and Turkmen not be cancelled.

The Turkish minister's proposal was supported by both NATO Secretary General Luns and chief of the allied forces in Europe, General Rogers. Papandreou said that the Greek Government has no objection that this meeting be held at some time, but not now while Turkish violations are still fresh. The Greek Government, the prime minister said, wants a long period of detente in relations between Greece and Turkey to precede the meeting. In other words, he said, the Greek Government seeks a new moratorium, the duration of which will be decided by Greece.

KREISKY CRITICIZES ISRAELI PARTY, USSR SANCTIONS

AU011014 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Madrid, December 1 -- Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky has charged that the official policy line of Israel's Party, the opposition alignment led by Shimon Peres, is in radical opposition to the principles of international socialism and added that he "does not want to be the vice president of a Socialist International which supports the policy of the Israeli Labor Party".

The Chancellor's tough remarks on the Israeli party were carried in the Tuesday edition of the Spanish daily, DIARIO 16, in an interview in which Kreisky also spoke out in favor of furthering detente and against the resurgence of the cold war climate of the 1950's.

With reference to the workings of the Reagan administration in Washington, the Austrian statemen flatly declared that "it is stupid" to think that the Soviet Union can be brought to its knees by the application of economic pressure.

TRADE OFFICIAL SEEKS MORE EXPORTS TO USSR

AU011555 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 1 Dec 82 p 7

[Text] Vienna -- Despite the positive development of commodity trade with Moscow, the Austrian trade deficit is still considerable, Federal Chamber of Commerce Secretary General Kehrer stated in Moscow at the opening of the Austrian economic branch symposium for oil and natural gas industry equipment in which more than 30 firms are participating. "We are introducing ourselves, and we hope that in the future our oil and natural gas imports, which are valued at slightly over 20 billion schillings annually, can be paid for with Austrian equipment for the oil and gas industry to a greater extent than in the past," Kehrer noted. He then proposed a doubling of Soviet purchases of pertinent equipment.

In connection with the branch symposium, Kehrer pointed out that Austria's delivery potential was not confined to sheet iron and tubing but that it should also comprise compenents for this important industrial branch, including the great pipeline projects. Thus, Austria is also capable of exporting gas processing plants, pipeline components, fittings, telemetric control equipment and electronic distributing installations. The opening of the symposium was also attended by Soviet First Deputy Minister of the Petroleum Industry Igrevskiy.

NETHERLANDS

NRC HANDELSBLAD ON U.S. AND SOVIET POLICIES

PM301655 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 23 Nov 82 p 7

[Editorial: "Choices"]

[Text] Will the death of Soviet President Brezhnev make it possible to move U.S.-Russian relations in a positive direction? It would seem that the White House and the Kremlin are both busy declaring this, or so it would appear from the most recent statements by President Reagan and party leader Andropov.

Nevertheless, the U.S. Administration has no inclination for an overhasty change of course. The Soviet Union must take the first steps, the U.S. secretary of state said at the end of last week, because it has created the major obstacles. But if there are Russian steps and specific results seem possible, then President Reagan is prepared to take part in a summit meeting, Shultz said.

An immediate response to this came from Moscow. Detente is possible only if both countries make concessions, the Kremlin said.

President Reagan's cautious maneuverings are to be explained in part by his fears of losing domestic support for his arms program, which he still sees as an essential component of his overall policy, which could be lost by following too optimistic a foreign policy course. Opposition to the enormous amount of military spending is still growing, because many people view it as the most important reason for the sizable budget deficit hanging like a millstone around the neck of the U.S. economy.

For this reason, it is unclear whether Congress will approve the President's plans for the deployment of the new MX missiles the production of which was announced yesterday. The project to produce 100 such weapons has already been accepted with some hesitation by Congress on the condition that the president must produce convincing plans for their deployment before 1 December.

The method of deployment now chosen is viewed by many U.S. experts as not really safe or effective.

In short, the discussion about the line to be followed vis-a-vis Moscow is still going on, and it is still unclear whether what for him was a less than satisfactory election result at the beginning of this month will force Reagan to push ideology a little further into the background.

Something similar is also true of the Soviet Union, at least in the present transitional phase. Andropov will still have to show that he is able to accompany conciliatory words with actions. Actions which convince not only Washington but also Beijing of the sincerity of the Russian desire for detente. Two central themes here are the Russian occupation of Afghanistan and the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea which is supported by the Soviet Union. Peace, President Reagan said last night, it is a goal which we finally hope to achieve, but it is not a policy; that is, it is not a concept which says anything about the ways and means used to achieve it.

This phrase is not incorrect if it is intended to show opposition to vague yearnings for peace which do not concern themselves with the special conditions necessary for achieving peace. There is the danger that it merely gives the impression that at the end of the road a static, conflictless situation, called peace, will be waiting for us. This is not the case. Peace, as Reagan's predecessor Kennedy demonstrated, is a dynamic affair.

It is a result of the willingness to find a solution to constantly recurring conflicts in a peaceful way. Once it has been established, it must be daily reestablished. And a fundamental consideration is the willingness to look for rational forms for the resolution of conflicts.

CHANCELLOR KOHL ON 6 MARCH ELECTION DATE

DW011045 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Earnst-Dieter Lueg; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Will you have finished your talks with the chairmen of the parties and factions by the end of this week, and will you say next week for sure what the procudure [for elections] will be?

[Answer] I will announce this very soon. I have't quite finished my talks yet or my considerations on constitutional law which must be most carefully pondered. However, I have publicly said that it will be very soon. This is because of the nature of the matter and of the envisaged date.

[Question] So, new elections will definitely be held on 6 March next year?

[Answer] I presume so.

SPD's Vogel on Confidence Vote

DW011403 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Interviewwith SPD chancellor candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel by reporter Peter Ellgaard in Bonn; date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Have all the reservations and doubts of the Social Democrats over the way to hold new elections been eliminated after your talks [with Chancellor Kohl]?

[Answer] I can't say for sure. The actual topic of the talks was my offer of fair opposition, on which we agreed. I gained the impression that the federal chancellor wants to use Article 68, that is, a vote of confidence, and he accepted my statement that he will get 225 clear and credible negative votes from the Social Democrats in this vote of confidence.

[Question] Aren't you afraid that if a suit if filed in Karlsruhe [at the Constitutional Court], these considerations would become immaterial?

[Answer] I was the legal and constitutional adviser to the Helmut Schmidt government; I am not the legal and constitution adviser to this government. What we, the Social Democrats, can contribute is the negative votes. No differences of approach exist in this respect. Everything else is beyond our control. We take the promise of the chancellor seriously; we want to have these elections, but he must create the prerequisites.

[Question] Do you continue to assume that 6 March will remain the election date?

[Answer] I presume so. The chancellor has just confirmed this to me, and I have no doubts that he is serious and that he will keep this date.

BRIEFS

EXPATRIATES FROM USSR -- Moscow -- The number of German expatriates from the USSR will not be more than 2,000 this year. This is the lowest number in 10 years. In 1981 some 3,595 Soviet citizens of German origin were permitted to leave for the FRG despite a drastic cut in exit permits. [Text] [Bonn DIE WELT in German 1 Dec 82 p 1 DW]

MITTERRAND ON USSR, MIDEAST, U.S. ISSUES

PM011143 Paris LE MATIN in French 27-28 Nov 82 p 9

[Text] At the conclusion of his visit to Egypt, Francois Mitterrand discussed several topical issues with the journalists accompanying him. With regard to [former French Premier] Edgar Faure's visit to Moscow, the president of the republic said: "Mr Faure is going to Moscow. I have discussed that with him. I think he can be useful to French policy." With regard to Franco-Soviet relations he stated: "I reject the term rapprochement." He added that present relations between Paris and Moscow are being conducted in a "moderate atmosphere." As for the possibility of a Franco-Soviet summit, he said: "There will certainly be one, every minute brings it closer."

Drawing the initial conclusions from his visit to Egypt, the head of state noted in Aswan that there is "a common strategy between France and Egypt, especially at the regional level."

"We hope," Francois Mitterrand added, "that the age-old balance between the Arab world and the Persian world will be preserved."

Stressing the risks of "a chain of instability" which could be caused by that [Iran-Iraq] war, the French president added: "The Western powers must devote their efforts to preserving the balance. We would not want Iraq to be defeated in this war. I express the hope that this tragedy will be ended as soon as possible on a balanced basis." The president then stated that he "did not want Iran to be defeated either."

Questioned on U.S. President Reagan's recent announcement of an agreement among the Western countries on East-West trade, the head of state said: "That type of agreement requires political approval by those responsible for implementing it, and that was not the case the other Saturday." "The United States must be aware that France cannot agree to any impediment to the free exercise of its sovereignty," he added.

Mitterrand then made a point of specifying that previously, the U.S. President had twice been informed of the French position by the Elysee and the Quai d'Orsay. "Reagan knew he was running the risk of being repudiated," the head of state remarked.

Asked why he had not spoken with Mr Reagan on the telephone, he replied: "Y u do not negotiate in the prior 15 minutes" [as published].

CHEYSSON VISITS SWITZERLAND, REVIEWS DIFFERENCES

PM011003 Paris LE MONDE in French 21-22 Nov 82 p 32

[Jean-Claude Buhrer report]

[Excerpts] (From our correspondent) [No date, as published] Bern -- Traditionally almost cloudless, the relations between France and Switzerland have been slightly affected by the economic recession. Such is the conclusion which [external relations minister] Cheysson could have come to Friday 19 November at the end of his 24-hour official visit to Bern.

The talks which Mr Cheysson had with the chief of the Foreign Affairs Department, Pierre Aubert, and the Confederation's president and chief of the Department of Public Economy, Fritz Honegger, presented an opportunity to examine the main points of contention between France and Switzerland in a spirit described by the Swiss side as "amicable, open and objective."

Mr Aubert voiced the concerns felt by the Swiss economic circles who consider their interests harmed by the "protectionist" measures adopted by France to reduce its foreign trade imbalance. Trade exchange between the two countries is largely in France's favor: In 1981 the latter recorded a surplus of Fr 12,2 billion.

The Bern authorities have renewed their invitation extended to [French President] Mitterrand for next spring. The last official visit by a French head of state took place 73 years ago.

LE MONDE ON GATT 'DEFEAT' FOR UNITED STATES

[Editorial: "A Defeat for Washington"]

[Excerpts] "A partial success," Mr Brock, President Reagan's special representative at the trade negotiations, said at the end of the interminable GATT ministerial session which ended in Geneva Monday. That is a strange way of viewing things and there is reason to wonder whether it has any chance of fooling people, even in Washington. Although the United States avoided a resounding split, it did not attain any of its objectives. The developing countries on the one hand and the Community on the other essentially succeeded in opposing the offensive launched by President Reagan. His administration, counting on the Ten's divisions, thought it could wear down the common agricultural policy and force the EEC to reduce the subsidies it grants for exports to outside countries. It failed.

After the retreat in the embargo affairs, this is the second U.S. defeat before the Europeans in a short period. Is the irritation which this new setback will cause likely to strengthen the hawks within Congress and the administration -- those who are more tempted than frightened by the prospect of a trade confrontation with the EEC? The Americans brandished that threat throughout the week. After having their fingers burned by the rather pitiful conclusion of the dispute which followed the embargo, it is to be hoped, however, that they will not act in haste.

Europe demonstrated solidarity, perhaps because Mr Reagan's cavalier attitude irritates it, but more because it fears for its existence, because it fears that the crisis might destroy it. German Economics Minister Lambsdorff is aware of the sorry situation of French foreign trade. He prefers a united Community to act on the fringes to try to improve that record rather than see [French Minister of State for Foreign Trade] Jobert turn to Bonn in order to find the means, whether good or bad, which would make it possible to achieve a better balance in trade between France and the FRG. There is reason to think that that analysis helped to turn him, and the British, into zealous defenders fo the common agricultural policy. In the future it might prompt him to go back on the position he has hitherto defended and authorize the Commission to negotiate agreements aimed at the voluntary limitation of Japanese exports of electronic products and machine tools, as Paris is requesting.

This resurgence of European cohesion is, therefore, possibly not spontaneous. But it is still a positive, reassuring event and if it is extended into the industrial sphere, it could revive enthusaism.

CRISIS REPORTED IN RELATIONS WITH BULGARIA

NC012127 Paris AFP in English 2109 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Rome, Dec 1 (AFP) -- The theory of an international plot behind the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II continues to gain ground in Italy.

It was reported that the Bulgarian Foreign Ministry had called in the Italian ambassador in Sofia to remind him that two Italians were being held on espionage charges in Sofia.

Deputy Foreign Ministry Liuben Gotzev told Ambassador Carlo Maria Rossi yesterday that his government saw the Antonov affair -- Sergey Ivanov Antonov, second most senior Bulgarian airline executive in Rome, was arrested last week and is being questioned about Turkish extremist Mehmet Ali Agca's shooting of the pope -- as the "most serious crisis between our two friendly nations since the second world war".

The case underwent a fresh development yesterday with the news that a photograph taken moments after the shooting showed a man strongly resembling Mr Antonov in Saint Peter's Square. Mr Antonov has denied being in the square that day.

Mr (?Gotzen), who had summoned the ambassador for the second time in connection with the [words indistinct] demanded that inquiries into Mr Antonov be passed from the judiciary to a "political level".

The photograph, reportedly being examined by police scientific experts, was splashed on all front pages in Italy today. Suggestions that the picture was faked were dismissed as it appeared almost a year ago in a book titled "The Pope's 100 Days -- Journey Into Suffering" published by the editor of the Vatican newspaper L'OSSERVATORE ROMANO, Sergio Tresatti. The photo, which shows John Paul supported by his aides, was taken by the pope's photographer, Arturo Mari.

Italian newspapers have reported that it was Mr Antonov who reserved a room for Agca, arrested on the spot and convicted of the attempted murder this year, when he arrived in Rome.

Two Turks, wanted for complicity in the assassination plot along with another recently extradited to Italy from Switzerland, have reportedly sought refuge in Sofia.

The espionage case mentioned by the Bulgarian minister involves two Italian tourists, Paolo Farsetti, 34, and Gabriella Trevisin, 26. On leaving Bulgaria at the close of a holiday, the two reportedly refused to pay huge export duties demanded on a locally bought coffee service and stayed on in the hope of fixing the matter.

Two days later, on August 25, police arrested them at their hotel. On September 12 Italian consular officials were informed that the men were accused of espionage. Mr Gotzey told the Italian ambassador yesterday that inquiries into the case were now closed. The Italians risk 10 to 20 years imprisonment.

The Italian press recalled today that on September 12 the official Bulgarian news agency had commented in connection with Western press speculation on the "Bulgarian connection" that it would not be surprising if, at "someone's" suggestion and the promise of a handsome reward, "Agca confessed that the Bulgarians had hired him to kill the pope".

DC SECRETARY'S PROPOSAL FOR SAVING WELFARE STATE

PM301447 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 24 Nov 82 p 3

[DC Secretary Ciriaco do Mita interview by Massimo Riva in Rome; date not specified]

[Excerpt] Rome -- Would you care to explain to me how a start can be made on remedying the bureaucratic paralysis and unproductivity that has overtaken the public administration?

[Answer] I have no miracle remedies. But I do believe that we could start by reacting against the widespread fatalism regarding the state's financial commitments. Full freedom of movement must be restored to those responsible for individual budgets; a mechanism must be examined that will enable us to take the decisions, year by year, without which the government feels constrained by automatic spending mechanisms.

[Question] Frankly this itself seems to be revolutionary; do you really believe it can be done?

[Answer] Even just cutting spending would be revolutionary in some respects. Except that on its own it would not resolve matters. Let me explain; it would be like filling a big-engined car with only a little gas. The car will not consume less; the first result would be that the car would come to a halt.

[Question] Does that mean that we must change cars, buy a smaller one -- a Minghetti model, so to speak?

[Answer] I would be less drastic. The welfare state exists and cannot be eliminated. Returns to the past cannot be proposed, and are in fact dangerous. You mentioned Minghetti, but then Italy was different. Now we must be rigorous, but in a different way. We must concentrate more on law and productivity rather than on the quantity of public spending.

[Question] Could you give a specific example of this different approach?

[Answer] Here is one. Let us start with drawing a distinction among the various tasks of the public administration. There are some, such as external defense and internal security, that cannot be delegated by the state to anyone. But in the field of many other social services, it is possible and indeed necessary to restore rivalry and private competition, especially with regard to management.

[Question] I still lack a practical example; will you give me one?

[Answer] Let us take the health sector. We are confronted with a mammoth bureaucratic complex that is reflected in very poor services to the citizen and huge costs to the state. I suggest focusing public attention not on the bureaucratic machine but on the citizen and his needs. The state defines a priori how much it can make available for health needs, and then the system of medical assistance is thrown wide open, with everyone seeking their treatment requirements wherever the market best meets them.

[Question] If I am not mistaken, this implies foregetting about health reform and returning to private clinics and doctors.

[Answer] There is one point on which we must reflect; with their expenses paid by the state, public hospitals are accumulating more and more deficits, while private clinics present excellent balance sheets. This means that the latter are managed with an efficiency unmatched in the public sector. Therefore, it is indispensible that the entire sector be exposed to market influences.

[Question] Do you believe that the same can be done with all the services now provided by the state, including education?

[Answer] This must certainly be done. I am a catholic, but I say that the Catholics made a great mistake by failing to make Italian universities free, rather than state-run. In other words, the principle must be as follows: Whoever wants to attend university can go to whichever one he wants and can keep it running by paying attendance fees.

[Question] Pardon me, but does that mean that the universities will be closed forever to those without enough money?

[Answer] Oh no, I am not saying that. My idea is that education structures, at least at the top, must be entirely autonomous on the cultural plane and self-sufficient on the financial plane. As for needy and deserving citizens, the state must intervene, but only to permit them to pay attendance fees, not to maintain bureaucratic structures that ultimately increase their demands beyond all acceptable limits.

[Question] If this is not the dismantling of the welfare state, it is not far from it. It seems to me that you adopted a Reagan-type line, have you not?

[Answer] No, that is not so. In fact, in the United States, when Roosevelt came to power, many people said that he would destroy the capitalist system. Instead he submitted it to a remedy that cured it. What I am proposing is not the end of the welfare state, but a way of preventing its total collapse. My main concern is to combat the widespread temptation to regard the illness of public finance as incurable. If one proceeds from this idea, one ultimately proposes, as many do, a return to the past, and even the elimination of the political system that led to this situation.

VATICAN NOTES SHORTAGE OF PRIESTS IN LITHUANIA

LD021212 Vatican City in Lithuanian to Europe 1800 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Excerpts] The parish priest in Leliunai, Panevezys diocese Petras Janulis, died on 29 November. According to our information, Rev Petras Janulis is the 17th priest in Lithuania and the 5th priest in Panevezys diocese to die this year. There are more than 20 parishes in Panevezys diocese without priests. This year the diocese received only two new priests from the Kaunas priest seminary.

Kuciunai parish priest Rev Juozas died on 30 November in Lazdijai rayon, Vilkaviskis diocese. He is the 18th priest in Lithuania and the 4th in Vilkaviskis diocese to die this year. As is known, out of 18 graduates from the Kaunas priest seminary ordained this year, only 1 was appointed to the Vilkaivskis diocese. There are about 12 parishes without priests in Vilkaviskis diocese.

Who is going to replace the dying priests? This question alarms every believer in Lithuania. Meanwhile, as is known, the atheist authorities continue to reduce the number of students at the Kaunas priest seminary. This year permission was given to admit to the seminary only about 20 young people, although there were at least twice as many expressed a wish to become priests.

FRENCH SHOW 'INTRANSIGENCE' ON EEC QUESTIONS

[Editorial: "French Intransigence"]

[Excerpts] France's intransigent stance on Mediterranean agricultural products is gravely jeopardizing Portugal's entry into the EEC in 1984. In fact French Minister for European Affairs Andre Chandernagor's tough proposal, which was put forward in Brussels on Monday, has the sole aim of trying to delay our country's entry into the Common Market.

The French objections are apparently reasonable. Portuguese agriculture indeed has structural weakness, poor organization and exports -- especially in the fruits and vegetables sector -- and has failed to satisfy the needs of domestic demand. This has led, moreover, to the country's considerable dependence in foodstuffs and is one of the main causes of its grave trade imbalance.

What lurks behind the French attitude? Portugal is not in fact a major producer of Mediterranean crops. In some years it even imports oil and exports virtually only port wine to the common market. France is particularly afraid of Spanish agricultural competition. According to its agriculture minister, Edith Cresson, the neighboring country's entry should not take place without the Community concluding an agreement on fruit and vegetables and determining who will pay what to support olive oil production. Paris is surely extending this stance to Portugal in order to avoid precedents.

The Mitterrand government has proved quite tough and pragmatic in the implementation of its economic policy. Perhaps alarmed by its increasing trade deficit, it is multiplying restrictive measures on imports to protect French industry and agriculture. In a period of international recession such as we are experiencing, it will only reluctantly open its market to a potentially dangerous competitor.

For Mrs Cresson, the problems posed are not Portuguese-French or French-Spanish problems, but those of the southern European countries with the Community. However, it would be foolish to believe that the tightening of political relations can be achieved by erecting economic barriers. Nor would it be very sensible on the part of Portuguese leaders to harbor optimistic expectations about the date of joining the club of the Ten, when it is confronted with interests and obstacles of an economic nature such as those created by France.

In accordance with the provisions of Article 62 of the Constitution, I hereby appoint as prime minister, Don Felipe Gonzalez Marquez, who has received the confidence of the Congress of Deputies by an absolute majority in the first vote held during the session of the above-mentioned date in accordance with Section 3 of Article 99 of the constitutional rules.

At the end of the simple ceremony, the new prime minister and the six persons in attendance had a brief conversation with Don Juan Carlos.

FELIPE GONZALEZ ANNOUNCES NEW CABINET MEMBERS

LD012232 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Reply by Felipe Gonzalez, Spanish prime minister-elect, to a speech by Miguel Roca, representative of the Catalan minority, during the debate of the Socialist government's program in the Spanish Congress of Deputies -- live]

[Excerpts] I should like to satisfy Senor Roca's curiosity and his right to know the composition of the government. I should like to say to him, as I have already said publicly, that up to the last minute I reserve the right, after I have been invested and enjoy the confidence of the house, and naturally after having taken the oath in the presence of the King -- up to the last minute I reserve the possibility which is constitutionally valid of making the changes which I thought appropriate.

I do not know whether it would be too obvious to tell you who the person is who holds the candidature and is endeavouring to be invested as prime minister.

The deputy minister will be Senor Alfonso Guerra.
The minister of foreign affairs, Don Fernando Moran.
The minister of justice, Don Fernando Ledesma -- it would be more correct to give the second surname, but this would take longer.

The minister of defense, Don Narcis Serra I Serra.
The minister of economy, trade and minister of finance -- to give it exactly -- Don Miguel Boyer.
The minister of the interior, Don Jose Barrionuevo Pena.
The minister of public works and town planning, Don Julian Campo.
The minister of education and science, Don Jose Maria Maravall.
The minister of labor and social security, Don Joaquin Almunia.
The minister of industry and energy, Don Carlos Solchaga.
The minister of agriculture, fisheries, and food, Don Carlos Romero.
The minister of the prime minister's office, Don Javier Moscoso.
The minister of transport, tourism and communications, Don Enrique Baron.
The minister of culture, Don Javier Solana Madariaga.
The minister of territorial administration, Don Tomas de la Cuadra Salcedo.
The minister of health and consumer affairs, Don Ernesto Lluch Martin. [applause]

GONZALEZ SPEAKS ON ENTRY INTO NATO, EEC

LD012222 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1802 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Reply by Felipe Gonzalez, Spanish prime minister-elect, to a statement by Marcos Vizcaya, deputy of the Basque Nationalist Party, in the debate of the Socialist government's program at the Spanish Congress of Deputies -- live]

[Text] In the foreign policy area we are once again going over the long debate we held during earlier discussions, particularly those in committee, on Spain's joining NATO. I recall you raised some substantial snags over membership at that time while being substantially in agreement with the political decision to join. I do not want to go over the whole debate again, repeating myself though my position remains the same.

A bilateral relationship fundamentally serves the interests -- or ought to serve them, and I use those words in the light of the need to reconsider and therefore of the possible renegotiation of the bilateral treaty with the United States. I am using each of those words with the precision they require at this moment, given that they concern matters which you yourself have referred to us as affairs of the previous government, affairs which have not changed very much. Indeed, we would hope that in the area of foreign policy, the changes we might have to introduce over the course of time might be only the minimum necessary. I made a point of this yesterday, saying that we are striving to pursue a policy of state. At this moment I am striving for rapprochement with your position and with other different positions in this house, to achieve a confluence of interests which will truly represent the wishes of the immense majority of Spaniards. But that bilateral negotiation [Gonzalez begins to say "renegotiation" but corrects himself] can and must serve, first and foremost, as we see it, the defense interests of Spain. From the viewpoint of the other party, it may serve more overall defense interests. If the negotiations served defense interests which were respectable but more international than national then it would be necessary to reconsider and renegotiate that bilateral treaty.

With this reasoning I am replying to something which is always presented as a contradiction. I have said many times, and I have said it to our own interlocutors: No citizen of any nation in the world wants to have any kind of foreign military installation on its territory. The first to take that view are the citizens of the United States.

So I believe there are no disagreements on this point, that the whole world can accept this truth as quite unquestionable and indisputable. Because of historical considerations, however, concerning the maintenance of the status quo and above all heeding the interests of our national defense, which daily need to be defended with a stance of greater indepedence and greater sovereignty, we adopt that position, which is not one of dependence on the United States but rather one of a bilateral relationship, which is not the same concept. And, without going into a debate on our stance, we have still not heard a single argument of substance to prove to us the advantages for our national defense, for our national security, for Spanish foreign policy or for its domestic development of joining the multilateral pact of the North Atlantic Treaty.

I do not know whether it is necessary for me to spell out again that it is not a question here of a Greek-style situation. This is because we are not integrated into the military organization of the North Atlantic Treaty. We are not integrated. We are, therefore, at the stage of political alliance, and at the beginning of a process of negotiation on military integration which -- as I said a little earlier -- we are going to freeze. In other words, we are not going to integrate Spain into the military organization of the North Atlantic Treaty, or, to put it in common parlance, into NATO.

There may well be differing opinions. We discussed this at the time, I now repeat it again. I also covered the flank of those who wondered at that time whether we might not be doing a service to other interests. This will never be a problem for the Socialists, because the service we wish to perform is service to national soveriegnty and independence.

Earlier I used a phrase which might perhaps have sounded aggressive, though I wish it only to be expressive. I find it impossible even to imagine there being somebody holding the status of a military commander over a Spanish military officer on territory belonging to our sovereignty. And we shall have occasion to talk at length about this subject, in order to prove what I have already said on a previous occasion; namely, that things had been hurried, the the interests of Spain had not been sufficiently guaranteed and that the interests of our foreign policy had not been sufficiently guaranteed.

You ask me about the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. I shall tell you my position after having given careful thought to the matter. I am for signing the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. However, what I want to say is that first I would like to have every possible guarantee that such a signing would not be used against the necessary storing of supplies for Spain. I shall not therefore give away what is a resolute will on my part and have it turned into an instrument for negotiation with others. So, we have the will to sign the non-proliferation treaty on the one hand, and on the other there must be negotiation over the conditions on which that signing can come about.

What I will tell you, however, is that we shall hold firmly to our undertaking not to nuclearize Spain now that certain problems are blowing up over the stationing of nuclear weapons in what is called the European theater for tactical weapons.

As for joining the EEC, I believe that this wish is shared by all. References have been made to negative statements about Spanish entry to the EEC. The effects of a political attitude are always difficult to measure. We have followed domestically and internationally through our knowledge of international relations, the whole process of negotiations. We became aware at a certain moment of what we saw as an erroneous approach to the problems and the process of joining the EEC. There is a person present in this chamber who undertook to correct that approach and give due measure to the process of negotiation which was to be global and bilateral with each of the countries making up the EEC.

I want also to tell you, however, that we want it made quite clear to our European friends that the process of blocking Spanish entry to the EEC cannot be permanent. It cannot be permanent. I am one of those people who have held the view that there is no use setting deadlines which then have to be broken time after time. We have already had a number of examples of that. All the same, I believe we have the right to say to the EEC that whatever difficulties the EEC may have internally, Spain, by complying with the requirements of the Treaty of Rome, has the right to become a member of the EEC. I know that this is a question of negotiation, but such negotiations can be conducted from clear and firm positions. If countries like France, Germany or Britain have difficulties, with regard to joining that group of nations, Spain has even worse ones, due to its inadequate economic structure and its uneven growth process. It is, therefore, difficult to understand how the EEC can talk from time to time about the famous new orders in international economic relations or about cooperation with countries of the south, when it fails to face with due courage -- and this must be stressed again to the European nations -- to something which is relatively much easier, namely, cooperation between the north and the south of Europe.

NEW POLICIES SHOULD REFLECT STRONG TIES TO U.S.

[Editorial: "The External Priority"]

[Text] Every government implies a policy. In choosing the people who will form his cabinet, Felipe Gonzalez has undoubtedly borne in mind the outlines of the policy which he intends to follow.

Judging by all the signs, one thing seems clear: Mr Gonzalez is preparing a program of change which at the same time will be a program of stability. He does not wish to rely solely on his party's members, but to extend, even beyond the voters who have given him a broad parliamentary majority, an attraction composed of restraint and hope.

The solemnity promoted by the constitutional timetable -- which, as we already asked in this column shortly after the results were known, has fortunately not been hastened -- is helping to establish preferences or priorities which will be seen in the investiture speech itself, in the choice of personnel and in the first steps.

One of the uncertainities which will have to be clarified first is foreign policy. In the present-day world of powerful blocs which maintain peace -- if it may be called so -- thanks to a delicate balance of power, the scope for neutralism or nonalignment has been disappearing. Even if the expression and some gestures remain, the substance has been absorbed by the reality of world politics.

No consistent international policy can be developed today without making it quite clear in advance, where you stand. The "where" provides the background and color of the paper on which the designs corresponding to the country's needs and the government's plans can then be drawn. There is little doubt that we are in the Western world. Moreover, Felipe Gonzalez referred to that very area in his campaign.
